SEC. 3. That such committee be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts, deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before such committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; the expenses involved in carrying out the provisions of this resolution, one half to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the other half out of the contingent fund of the House; and that such committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to pass this resolution. The matter ought to be taken up by the Committee on Appropriations. In fact, the Appropriations Committee of the Senate have this question before them in the matter of appropriations for the Child Labor Bureau, the Census Bureau, and others that are doing this kind of work. We appointed a man who is doing work in the Treasury Department, Mr. Brown, who is known as an efficiency man, to look into this question and to report to the Appropriations Committee the amount of duplication of work that is being done, and the character of it, by the Public Health Service. I think this matter could be just as well treated, if not better treated, by the Committee on Appropriations, rather than by a special committee. I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would not object, because I feel that the Committee on Appropriations can scarcely find time to look into the question. I think that such a committee as is provided for by the concurrent resolution is necessary. It really is nothing more than a resolution authorizing the holding of hearings and the payment of stenographers, except that instead of being the Public Health Committee I thought it was better, in order to have both branches of Congress represented, to have a joint committee appointed. I might have asked the chairman of the Public Health Committee for a resolution authorizing the Public Health Committee to hold hearings, but I thought, in order that the matter might come up in a fairer way and receive the direct consideration of both branches of Congress, it would be better to have a special committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will not object to its consideration. I will not vote for it. I will withdraw my objection to its consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. CALDER. I move to amend the resolution, in line 14, page 1, by striking out the words "March 1" and in lieu thereof inserting "June 1."

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being Senate bill 3288.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. STANLEY. I send to the Secretary's desk the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending now. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to strike out on page 77, line 22, the paragraph extending to line 17 on the following page.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Regarding that amendment I would like to make a brief explanation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. I will yield the floor to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. President, this amendment is to strike out, on page 77, beginning with line 22, the proviso, including the balance of the paragraph, after the word "Provided" in that line, down to and including line 17, on page 78. It relates to the long-and-short-haul provision of the bill.

The effect of the amendment would be to leave the so-called long-and-short-haul rule, as it is contained in the act to regulate commerce, unqualified. I feel reassured in offering the amendment and in urging its adoption from the support which it has from the chairman of the committee, whom I regard as perhaps the best informed and most widely experienced authority upon railroad questions in the country.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate in the last Congress considered a bill which had the same effect as this proposed amendment and reported that bill favorably, in quite an elaborate report, contained in Report 576 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, third session. I ask to have the report printed as a part of my remarks at the conclusion of what I shall have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before the Committee on Interstate Commerce it was testified by a reliable witness that by reason of the discrimination in railroad rates by which a lower rate was given for the long haul than for the short over the same line in the same direction for the same quality and class of goods or for passengers that a great interior section of the country, called the intermountain section, composed of States sometimes called the Rocky Mountain States—the States of Montana, Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, Arizona, Nevada, and the eastern portions of California, Oregon and Washington, east of the Cascade Range of Mountains—paid in excess freight, that is in rates that were in excess of the rates that were charged to the Pacific coast terminal points which were at a greater distance from the point of shipment, an annual amount of approximately $11,997,248 in addition to the freight rates that they would have had to pay for the shipment of the same amount and character of goods if they had enjoyed the same freight rates with which their competitors at the more distant points were favored.

As Mr. Campbell said in his testimony—

That is $998,104 a month, or $33,270 a day. The average excess war tax that will have to be paid by the intermountain country upon a similar amount of traffic would amount per year, if it ran a year, to $359,000 or $29,000 a month or $999 a day in excess war tax.

By that he means that in war tax upon freight bills, in addition to having to pay the excess discriminatory increased rate, that the country which was suffering from the discrimination was compelled to pay excess war tax upon the freight in excess of what the more distant communities were required to pay to the amount of $359,000 a year.

I think perhaps the situation that is intended to be remedied by the amendment can best be explained by stating the actual transaction of the shipment of freight and naming some of the sections which are affected by the discriminations referred to.

In the shipment of freight from Chicago, New York, Pittsburgh, or the other great centers of the East—and I am only stating these by way of illustration because the same principle applies to the South and it applies also in the West to shipments that are eastbound as well as those that are westbound—upon shipments from those great supply centers, we will say to San Francisco, a certain rate of freight is paid. The shipments pass through the city of Salt Lake. They go on 800 miles farther to the city of San Francisco. The same shipments over the same line, if delivered 800 miles short of the San Francisco destination, at Salt Lake City, or contiguous points in the State of Utah, pay a much higher rate of freight than if carried on to the terminus of the line.

It seems to me that a mere statement of the situation contains all the argument that is necessary to convince anyone who is familiar with the general principle of uniformity of taxes and uniformity of rates for public service in this country—which is a cardinal point upon which our institutions are based—of the absolute necessity of removing the discrimination if that principle is to be maintained.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to have the Senator state, if he will, what reason is urged for the discrimination between the longer and the shorter haul.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The principal reason that is urged or has been urged in the past is the necessity of the railroads to meet water competition at the Pacific coast. The actual influence, I think, which has been most powerful in maintaining the discrimination, has been the powerful influence of the larger cities at the terminal points on the seaboard in holding on to the advantage or supposed advantage which they have over their competitors. It is a perfectly natural action when we understand the inevitable, universal selfishness of human nature, that when they have an advantage which transfers to them the business of the interior they will exert every means and influence that they can command to prevent a change in the situation. And yet in clinging to this advantage they have lost the greater one of manufacturing and maritime growth.

The fact of the case is, however, that instead of there being actual water competition, which is put forward as the reason on the part of the railroads for making discriminatory rates to the terminal points, during the greater part of the existence of the discrimination, which has persisted through a number of years, since long before the completion of the Panama Canal, there has been no actual water competition at all.

The great fleets that we should have in the service of the Nation in transporting goods between the coasts of the Atlantic and the Pacific have not been developed because the railroads were allowed, under an interpretation of the proviso which is now proposed to be stricken out, to make rates to meet what was called potential water competition.

In other words, it was said that if the rates were not made at the terminal points water competition would be developed and that when developed it would take business away from the railroads. To speak frankly, the proviso has been interpreted by the Interstate Commerce Commission as though it were a tribunal established for the purpose of protecting the railroads. It is a commission whose function is to regulate and supervise the railroads, and from that fact there seems to have been deduced a principle of action by which in times past, at least, it assumed the trust of securing for the railroads all of the traffic that existed between the two coasts and preventing any of it from being diverted to water lines.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington if the point just now argued is not cared for in section 37 of the bill before us, where it provides that "no such authorization shall be granted on account of merely potential water competition not actually in existence"?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think so far as that point is concerned it is cared for in the provision that is contained in the bill and it was because of the practice just mentioned that the amendment was placed in the bill. But there are various other claims that have been made by the railroads and by the terminal cities, such as market competition and abuses of discriminations which arise under actual water competition which we are seeking to avoid and to abolish by striking out the proviso altogether.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, in reply to the question propounded by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], I wish to supplement the statement made by the Senator from Washington by an observation. Many of the large brokers and wholesale dealers and jobbers concentrate in the coast cities such as San Francisco. They desire to build up their business there and for that reason they have induced the railroads or have been in collaboration with the railroads in securing those points as the objectives of the freight, so that the people in the inland districts have been compelled to see their freight pass by their own doors and go on to the coast and then be transshipped back to Denver and Salt Lake City and Reno and intermediate points. It has been a conspiracy between some of the cities upon the coast and in favored districts and the jobbers and wholesalers and business men there, under which they have discriminated against many of the inland and interior points and thus built up large commercial centers where nature did not design them in many cases.

Mr. STERLING. The inference might be that the Interstate Commerce Commission in favoring the discrimination made of itself a trustee rather of the railroads with special regard for railroad interests rather than the public welfare.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is a very clear inference, and my impression is that privately it is, or until recently has been claimed, by members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that it is their function, of course within what they construe to be proper principles and legitimate limits, to protect the railroads against water competition.

The argument of the coast cities that they are entitled to discriminatory railroad rates because of their natural advantage of being located upon the ocean is entirely an illogical and inconsistent position. Nobody can take away from the coast cities their natural location and whatever advantage may be derived from it. The advantage of the terminal points on the Pacific coast is the advantage of being located upon the Pacific Ocean, and you can not take that advantage away from them, because you can not remove the Pacific Ocean. They are going to continue to be upon the ocean and it always seemed to me to be the height of inconsistency and poor logic to claim that because they had a great natural advantage, that the Government acting through its railroad commission should give them the artificial advantage of discriminatory railroad rates.

They say that they should have low rates because if they are not made freight will be shipped by water. I am at a loss to understand how it can be a disadvantage to a seaport to receive its goods by water instead of by railroads, if it receives them at a lower rate than the railroad can give them. If it is said on their behalf that the railroad service is more expeditious and they seek to gain that more expeditious service by making a special rate that is not subject to the general rule governing rates to other points, then they are seeking not a natural advantage but an artificial advantage, and they should be relegated to the competition of water lines, and the country should have the benefit which will come from the development of marine transportation, of which they are deprived if the railroads can make prohibitory rates with which the ship lines can not compete.

We have a great many terminal cities in my own State which are enjoying these descriminatory rates, but such discrimination is so abhorrent to the sense of fairness, which is characteristic of the American people, and to that right, as I regard it, to uniformity of treatment from the Government and from those agencies of Government performing public service functions, such as the railroads, that I have not the slightest doubt that the people themselves of these cities, aside from the particular interests which may be engaged in shipping over the railroads, will support this amendment and the abolishment of this discrimination.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's amendment goes to the extent of removing all discretion from the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to the long and short hauls, does it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And he proposes to leave no discretion anywhere on that subject?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I propose to leave no discretion anywhere to allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a rate for a long haul that is less than the rate which they make for a short haul over the same line in the same direction for the same class of goods. The amendment proposes to remove any discretion under those conditions and circumstances.

I may say that that was the purpose of the original interstate-commerce act. It was expected that that would be the general principle. Although certain discretion was vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission, it was expected that it would only be exercised in special cases; but, instead of that expectation being realized, the exception has become the rule, and throughout the South and the West this discrimination exists. In what is called the official classification territory, the territory lying north of the Potomac River and east of the Mississippi River, these abuses do not exist except in a very small degree; but in the South and in the West this discrimination is universal. In other words, every terminal, every point upon a southern river or upon the Pacific Ocean enjoys a lower rate for the long haul, the more expensive haul, involving greater service on the part of the transportation company, than does the intermediate point for a short haul and for a less expensive service. It is so abhorrent in itself to the fundamental principles of uniformity and justice that I believe the discretion to grant exceptions to those principles ought to be removed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My question is this: If the Senator's amendment prevails, no discretion is left anywhere with anybody to modify charges where circumstances seem to require it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No discretion is left anywhere to modify charges under the conditions that I have just stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As between the long and short haul principle?

Mr. POINDEXTER. As between the long and short haul. While they still may charge as much for the short haul as for the long haul, they would not be allowed to charge more for the short haul than for the long haul. That is correct.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. I desire to ask the Senator if the adoption of his amendment would produce a rigid application of a flat mileage rate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would not; and I am not in favor of a flat mileage rate, because a flat mileage rate would simply substitute one set of discriminations for another. What I am aiming at is to remove discriminations; to put communities upon an equal footing. Although in the development of the principle of railroad regulation in the future we may possibly come to a rate in accordance with the service, I am not now discussing that; I am not in favor of it at the present time. While it has been urged by some in opposition to this amendment, or to the bill, which is equivalent to it, that it would have the effect of establishing a mileage rate, that is based upon an absolute misapprehension of the amendment. It will do nothing of the kind. On the contrary, as I said a moment ago—using the West as an illustration, because I happen to have in mind the great trunk lines of railroad passing through that section and am familiar with the relative location of the particular communities—the shipment of freight passing through Boise, Idaho, and going 500 miles farther on to Portland, Oreg., if it were based upon a mileage basis would be very greatly less to Boise than it would be to Portland, but we do not propose anything of that kind. We have an amendment here which would still allow Portland to receive goods for the long haul—an excess of 500 miles over the haul to Boise, and a very expensive piece of transportation, because it goes through a mountain country, involving difficult and expensive railroad construction and expensive transportation because of the great power that is involved in taking trains over a mountain grade—for the same rate that Boise receives.

I hope that the idea that the amendment involves a mileage rate or anything tending toward a mileage rate will not be entertained in the consideration of the amendment.

Mr. MOSES. Did the Senator state that such a provision is in the bill now?

Mr. POINDEXTER. What provision?

Mr. MOSES. A provision which under the citation which the Senator has just made in the case of Portland and Boise, Portland would be allowed, if the bill should become a law, to receive a lower rate for the long haul?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; that is in the bill. There is nothing in the bill which affects that in any way at all. The railroads now grant a lower rate for the haul to Portland, and might be allowed to continue to do so if the bill should be enacted without the amendment which I propose. To illustrate, I shall tell of an incident, an actual case, which has no importance in itself because there are thousands of such cases, but it makes clear the situation. A dealer in Spokane, Wash., ordered a carload of coffee from New Orleans. The importers in New Orleans wired the Spokane house that they could not ship a carload of coffee at that time, but that there was a carload en route, on the rails, on the way from New Orleans consigned to Portland, Oreg., 350 miles farther on, and that they could arrange with a Portland house to let the Spokane house have that carload. As a matter of fact, it was switched off the main line at Spokane. If it had not been switched off it would have gone through the city of Spokane to Portland, 350 miles farther on; and yet because it was stopped 350 miles short and delivered at Spokane, the Spokane dealer, and consequently the Spokane consumers of coffee, were required to pay a much higher rate than if it had gone the longer distance.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to ask the Senator whether difference in the matter of rates is not based upon the economic situation which arises when water routes come into competition with rail routes? In order, I may say, for the shipment of coffee referred to, to reach Portland, where it would come into competition with water transportation, it was necessary for it to bear a smaller freight charge than if shipped to Spokane.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the theory I have just been discussing; that is the argument which is made; but my answer to that is, if the coffee could be shipped to Portland by water under fairly comparable conditions as to service which would obtain in a shipment by rail, then there is no reason why it should not go by water. Portland would be no worse off. The railroads would claim that they might lose the business, but the transportation business of the country consequent upon the increase of population and the volume of business and in view of the still more rapid increase which we will have in the near future, is and will be so great that the railroads can not attend to it; they have been congested; there will be more business than the railroads can handle; and it is in the interest of the country to allow the water lines to procure a portion of the business and for the benefit of Portland, the metropolis of the great State which the distinguished Senator represents here so well, to receive the advantages which would accrue to her from being in reality as well as in name a maritime city, of having ship lines and all the incidental business that comes from the building, operation, and supplying of ships.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was just going to suggest that the policy which is now in force has the effect really of preventing the development of the American merchant marine.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My opinion is that my colleague is absolutely correct in his statement——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why so?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment—and that this discrimination by which the railroads have been allowed to put their rates down under the pretext of meeting water competition, to put them down to such a point as would prevent the development of water competition, has been the most potent factor—more potent than all other circumstances put together—in preventing the development of maritime commerce upon our rivers and upon our coast lines.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Referring to the inquiry a few moments ago addressed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Washington, I am curious to know what particular conditions the Senator from Georgia had in mind which would justify a higher rate for the short haul than for the long haul. Of course, two conditions have been suggested in connection with this discussion; that is to say, competition to a point which has water communication and competition to a point which has railroad communication. Those two ideas have been advanced. Can the Senator from Georgia suggest any other conditions which would seem to justify the imposition of a greater charge for the short haul than for the long haul?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Those are the two main justifications that I had in view. Two railroads run between two points; one road is substantially longer than the other; the shorter line with the shorter mileage has a rate fixed for it. The very much longer line of railroad between the two points will not be able to carry any of the business unless its charge between the two terminals is the same rate which the short line charges. It might be impossible for all the business of the longer railroad to be conducted on that low mileage rate which would be essential to give it part of the business between the two places, and yet, as a part of its entire business in connection with its other business, it might be desirable for that railroad to haul the traffic which it would haul between the two points.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that is based upon the argument of a rate to a common competitive railroad point?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is one argument; the other is hauling to a point where there is water communication; so that we meet the same old argument; that is all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The result of the case stated by the Senator from Georgia—and he verifies the apparent assumption of the Senator from Montana that there are no other cases except these two, rail competition and water competition—would be that he would allow this long line that he speaks of, assuming the other conditions to be correct as he has stated them, in order to get a portion of this business at the junction point, to make a rate at what is called out-of-pocket cost—that is, to make a little more than the actual cost of the transaction itself without earning anything on the investment—in order to enable the railroad to get that he would tax the people along that line intermediate between the two points by compelling them to pay a higher railroad rate than they otherwise would have to pay.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That would be the effect of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I insist that it would. The Senator may have a different opinion, and I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only wish to stop the Senator long enough to say that I would not do it upon the theory that I overtaxed the intermediate points. The very power to carry this freight through as a part of the railroad's entire business might result in its being done more economically, whereas without that business it might be necessary to tax even higher the intermediate points.

It is an exceedingly complicated problem that really it is difficult for one who has not made a specialty of the study of freight rates and freight combinations to present, and I do not claim to have made a special study of it. I have gathered what information I have from certain hearings and investigations with which I have been connected, and I do not think the theory is that you increase the burden on the intermediate points, but that the whole volume of business carried by the transportation company makes it possible, even at the intermediate points, to carry freight for less than they would otherwise be able to carry it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the old, old argument.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but not necessarily unsound because old. A great many things that are old are sound, and I have listened with pleasure in the past few months to many very eloquent speeches by the Senator from Washington insisting that the old was better than some of the new that has been suggested, especially in international affairs.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true. That does not mean that everything that is old, particularly old arguments, is good, however. What I was talking about were old institutions, and the old Constitution of the United States. There are lots of old threadbare arguments that have been discarded and exploded that are not necessarily good because they are old.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was only desiring to contest the proposition that a thing is necessarily bad because it is old.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not say that it was.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am beginning to reach a period in life where I object to such a suggestion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator seems to admit that it is old; and he assumes that the intermediate points on all these rail lines, in objecting to this argument, which they have had thrust at them for 25 or 30 years, are mistaken about their own interests. The Senator argues that all of this great interior country of the South, which, unlike his city of Atlanta, is suffering from these discriminatory rates while Atlanta gets the benefit of lower rates, is fighting against its own interests; that the people of that section do not know what is good for them. He is arguing that in objecting to paying this $11,000,000 a year of excess freight rates, the intermountain country is simply preparing the way to have to pay a still greater burden of freight rates if the discrimination is removed.

There are a great many answers to that argument which we have had to meet for a generation or more. One of them is, and I think it is perfectly evident, that high rates are much less objectionable in themselves than discriminatory rates. It is not the high freight rates that people object to particularly in our country. We pay perhaps the highest freight rates that are paid in any section of the United States, and we are not seeking, directly at least, to have them reduced.

We do not know that a reduction of rates will necessarily be the result of this. What we are seeking is to remove the discrimination. What the interior towns in Georgia and in Tennessee and in other sections of the South are seeking is to remove the discrimination which they are suffering from, as against Atlanta and other points which are enjoying these lower rates which are made by the Interstate Commerce Commission at some terminal points, for the longer haul, whether on account of railroad competition or water competition. But actual experience shows that no such raising of rates would result. As a matter of fact, as shown by actual conditions on the Pacific coast, it is often the long line which gets the business in competition with the short line.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the Senator know whether or not the railroads under Government control have discontinued these discriminatory rates?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They have to a large extent. I do not think they have done so altogether, but they have to a very large extent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have heard that they have discontinued them to a very large extent. Now, if that is the case, is it not right and proper that under this legislation we should protect the country against a return to those practices and principles that have been going on in the past?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly that is the case, and that is the purpose of this amendment; and I am very glad indeed that the Senator from Nevada has pointed that out. I want to say also, in connection with that, that this apprehended injury that would be received by the terminal points, or those which are benefited by this discrimination, has not materialized at all. They have not been injured by removing the discrimination and putting them upon an equal basis with competing communities.

A large city like Atlanta is not going to be hurt because of the prosperity of the smaller towns surrounding it. Their prosperity will add to the prosperity of Atlanta, because they are tributary to it and will continue to be tributary to it; and the same thing is true of the great terminal points upon the Pacific and also upon the Atlantic.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one minute. I want to complete the point to which I was calling attention. It has been no injury to New York City to establish a system of rates by which manufacturing communities have been built up along all the lines of railroad in the great North and East. In Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana, clear to the Mississippi River, great manufacturing towns have been built up. It has not been an injury to Chicago. Those farther east have not been an injury to New York. Their prosperity has contributed to the prosperity of the metropolis, and the same thing will be true in other sections of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to assure the Senator that I had no particular place in view; and I agree with him fully that the development of all places around a large city within reach of the business of that city contributes greatly to the growth of the larger city itself. My suggestions with reference to this subject were due to the fact that it seems to me absolutely essential that there must, in some instances, be a disregard of the flat long-and-short-haul rule. If the Interstate Commerce Commission have gone too far in discriminations, they should cease it; but I was afraid that to strike out entirely the privilege of any consideration of peculiar circumstances which require an abandonment, at least to an extent, of the long-and-short-haul principle would produce embarrassment to commerce and add to the confusion that already exists in connection with transportation problems; and I hesitate to approve the suggestion that to no tribunal and nowhere shall any discretion be left upon that subject. I am afraid of its consequences, and the fear of trouble from it has come to me from many sections of the Southeast, and I have heard from nowhere any special protest against existing conditions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is natural that "fear of trouble" would come to the Senator from every city that is favored by lower rates than those charged its competitors. That is perfectly natural. I have had the same experience. Everybody has had the same experience. Every city that enjoys discriminatory rates is going to try to hold onto them. But the Senator is too experienced a statesman, too well versed in the fundamental principles of government, to favor the use of the powers of government or of public service to favor one community as against another on account of a protest of that kind, coming from purely selfish motives, which are of the most elementary and obvious kind.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a further interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Another idea in connection with the matter has suggested itself to me, in view of the recent statement of the Senator from Georgia. A great many people feel that these more or less doubtful questions should be intrusted to the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that it will act wisely in the premises, and so forth; but I submit to the consideration of the Senator from Georgia particularly whether we ought to repose any such power in the Interstate Commerce Commission or in any other board which gives it the opportunity to build up a terminal city, with the result of loss and destruction to the intervening points.

For instance, the rate from the eastern section of the country and the Middle West to Seattle, as pointed out, is considerably less than the rate to Helena or to Spokane. An industry, for instance, a packing house, is to be established at one of these places. Of course it will go to the place that has the lower rate. All of those products are carried to Seattle, for instance, as against Helena or Great Falls or Spokane, so you place it in the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to destroy a business, and a very profitable business, for instance, in one of these interior towns by compelling it to pay a higher rate than a competitor in the same line of business is obliged to pay at the terminal point. In other words, you place in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to say whether the interior towns shall be permitted to grow or whether the terminal points shall absorb all of the business of that section, and I do not believe we ought to place any such power as that in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just one second.

Mr. President, I do not believe such power should be placed in the hands of a Government tribunal any more than there should be placed in its hands the power to make one rate of taxes for one individual as against another rate for another individual. Railroad rates are for service of a public nature. Taxes are for service of a public nature, and the most elementary principle of taxation is that taxes should be uniform. I want to call your attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which they gave expression to the idea, which is obvious without such expression, that the chief purpose of all of the intricate laws for the regulation of interstate commerce is to secure this very thing—uniformity. It could not be abused to any greater extent than it has been abused under this long-and-short-haul provision.

In the case of Texas & Pacific Railway Co. v. The Abilene Cotton Mill Co. (204 U. S., 426) the Supreme Court says:

> That the act to regulate commerce was intended to afford an effective means for redressing the wrongs resulting from unjust discrimination and undue preference is undoubted. Indeed, it is not open to controversy that to provide for these subjects was among the principal purposes of the act. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Ry. Co., 167 U. S., 479, 494.) And it is apparent that the means by which these great purposes were to be accomplished was the placing upon all carriers the positive duty to establish schedules of reasonable rates which should have a uniform application to all.

It is quite surprising, Mr. President, that among the conspicuous abuses that have grown up under the proviso and under the exception vesting this discretion under the fourth section in the Interstate Commerce Commission is that this principle of uniformity which was the chief object of the section, as well as of the second and the third sections and of the act itself, has been absolutely destroyed in the making of comparative rates between communities, and discriminations have been established which have the same identical effect as discrimination between individuals, except that their blighting effect falls upon whole cities, States, and sections of the country. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HENDERSON. During all the years that these provisos and special section clauses have been in the act have they operated to the benefit of the interior States in any particular cases?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, they have retarded the growth of the interior communities. I do not think that there is any more deadly blight that can fall upon a community than to have to pay a higher freight rate than some rival community. It is obvious, from an examination of disputes before the Interstate Commerce Commission and in the courts, that even a very slight discrimination in a rate in favor of one individual as against another will have the effect of not only benefiting the one individual and injuring the other but will have the effect of making one prosperous and destroying the business of the other. It is a question of life or death. The only circumstances which have enabled these communities that have suffered from these discriminatory rates to survive and to progress at all have been the enormous natural resources of the country. They have lived practically upon themselves. They have paid a tribute to rival communities which sapped their strength and drew away their resources by reason of an artificial system of rates which favored other sections at their expense.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has not this principle done more to retard the development and prosperity of the interior States than any other one thing?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think more than all others together; and while it has been retarding the development of the intermediate country, it has been a national injury by the congestion of business at certain terminal points. Low freight rates in one community as compared with those in another community are a powerful magnet to draw business to that point, and as business accumulates at that particular point it becomes more expensive, ground becomes more valuable, and consequently the cost of production is increased. The living expenses of employees are higher and the public has to bear the consequences in the higher cost of living.

In a great emergency, such as the war suddenly brought upon us, when the capacity of the transportation systems of the country was taxed, we found that on account of this congestion at certain terminal ports, like New York City, which happened to be on that side of the continent from which shipments to the scene of war were being made, the congestion was so great as to paralyze transportation for weeks at a time and jeopardize the success of the Nation in a great crisis.

The policy of the country should be to encourage the distribution of manufacturing and business throughout the country at available points, in accordance with the natural opportunities and resources of those points, instead of drawing it all, as with some powerful artificial electric machine, into the vortex and maelstrom of an overcrowded and congested metropolis at the end of a railroad line.

I may say, Mr. President, that I can readily see lying back of the arguments that have been made in behalf of this abuse the benefit that the railroads have derived from it, and I am not saying this in disparagement of the railroad management. I expect people in business to look out for their interests. We do not expect men engaged in private business to subordinate the interests of that business to the public welfare. We expect that public welfare to be looked out for by the Government and by public tribunals.

Railroad companies are in the business of selling transportation, and if, in supplying a great area of country, they can establish a system by which the greatest possible amount of transportation, instead of the least necessary amount, will be sold it is manifestly to their advantage. So they have built up a system by which, beginning with the policy or theory of carrying commodities to the end of the line and then back to the intermediate points be gradually modified through the efforts and struggles of the communities which suffered from it, the railroads enjoyed the longest haul instead of the shortest.

I submit to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and to the Senate that a good public policy would be the reverse of that; that we should economize in transportation, that the least amount of transportation that would accomplish the object to be achieved, the delivery of the goods to the consignee, should be sought in any system of freight rates or in any regulation of railroads.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Interstate Commerce Commission is made up of experts who have given a thorough study to this question and a thorough study to the character of rates that are essential to furnish to the railroads themselves the most economic system of transportation. Does not the Senator think it probable that when they fix these rates they take the questions into consideration which the Senator has mentioned, and really have in view giving a system of rates that will facilitate the most economic transportation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not only I do not——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word further——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish the Senator would not ask too many questions at one time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well; I will stop for the present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I not only do not think they have done what the Senator seems to think they have done, but I know they have done just the opposite. They have not only not established a system of rates which tended toward the production of an economic system of transportation, but, on the contrary, they have made rates almost universally, wherever there was ever any excuse of railroad competition or water competition, lower at the longer point than they have made at the shorter point, and that is all that is necessary to be said to controvert the assumption of the Senator from Georgia. That is not an economic system of transportation. That is the most expensive system of transportation, because it encourages, by the lower rate, the hauling of goods the longer distance. The economic system of transportation is the hauling of them the shorter distance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is it not true that a long haul sometimes can be made cheaper than a short haul, and, entering into the whole of the business of the road, facilitates generally cheaper charges?

Mr. POINDEXTER. A long haul over the same line and in the same direction can not be made more cheaply than a short haul.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose the business to the one point were sufficient both ways to fill a car and to another point the car would be hauled empty if a rate was not given that enabled the handling of the business?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That does not change the question in any way at all. Even if it were necessary, after you have unloaded the car of its freight, to carry it on the balance of the journey to where it gets its return cargo, that would be much cheaper than hauling a loaded car to the end of the line and then hauling a load back again for distribution in the interior.

Nobody would propose that, because it is uneconomic, but it is not nearly so uneconomic and contrary to good business principles as it is to haul the entire load to the end of the line 350 or 800 miles of unnecessary transportation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia why the shipper should be compelled to pay the freight rate on hauling an empty car any distance after his load has been delivered?

Mr. McLEAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he intends to press for a vote on his amendment this afternoon?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not intend to press for a vote on it, but I am not going to occupy any great amount of time.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand the amendment has been offered, but has not yet been printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was offered on yesterday. I do not know whether it was printed or not. It is simply to strike out the proviso beginning on page 77.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator that I think there will be considerable objection to the amendment, and I wanted to know whether he was going to ask for a vote on it right away or whether he was simply discussing it, intending to bring it up later.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The amendment is pending now. I am not particularly zealous about pressing it immediately to a vote. Of course I would like to get it disposed of as soon as I can. But I want everyone who is interested in it to have a full opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that it was very thoroughly discussed in the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and the proviso finally determined upon was in the nature of a compromise, and I know that many of us had hoped that that would dispose of the matter. I shall certainly object to the amendment proposed by the Senator myself, and I think it would lead to some discussion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am discussing it now, and I presumed the Senator would discuss it. I do not want to shut off discussion. There is nothing in the intimation of the Senator that it should not have been offered, if that is his intimation, because it was understood, at least by some members of the committee, that I reserved the right to offer it in the Senate.

Mr. McLEAN. I am not questioning the right of the Senator to offer the amendment, but I am stating that it was pretty thoroughly considered by the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the Senator's intimation? That it has been considered sufficiently to take a vote on it right now? If that is his intimation, I agree with him, and we will take a vote.

Mr. McLEAN. No; my intimation was contrary to that, so far as the Senate is concerned. I think it is a matter that may not be understood by the Senate, and if action was to be had, I should ask for a quorum, and should hope that those interested in it would present their views to the Senate, especially those in opposition to it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Washington will yield, I want to assure the Senator from Connecticut that many of us are very earnest about it, and the bill will not go through, if some of us have our way, unless this provision is stricken out. It is so unjust, it has worked such hardships, such irreparable injury, to large sections of the country, it has been so discriminatory in favor of certain terminal sections, that I would regard the passage of the bill without eliminating the provision as a public calamity.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. McLEAN. I am not intimating——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand the position of the Senator from Utah. The provision is in the law now.

Mr. KING. I understand that.

Mr. CUMMINS. A failure to get out of the present law an objectionable provision ought not to be considered an objection against the bill.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, the bill if passed in its present form would perpetuate an existing evil, and while we are remedying evils and providing a new system for the regulation of railroads we ought to eliminate some of the evils that exist now.

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill does not perpetuate the evil in all its enormity, if I may use that term——

Mr. KING. No; it is an improvement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because it does modify to a degree, and a very material degree, the present law and removes to an extent some of the objections against the existing law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But you leave the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission subject to certain limitations that were deemed advisable.

Mr. CUMMINS. At the present time the Interstate Commerce Commission has entire, complete discretion to grant authority to a railroad to charge more for a shorter than a longer distance over the same line in the same direction. The bill attaches to that discretion the requirement that the lesser charge for the longer distance must be fairly compensatory. There is some difference between that and the rule adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is that the lesser rate for the longer distance must be at least sufficient to defray the out-of-pocket costs. The bill says "compensatory." There is some difference, of course, between a rate that pays out-of-pocket cost and a rate that is compensatory.

I do not intend to interfere at the present time, but I did not want the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to charge up against the bill evils which have been obvious in the present law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I did not understand that the Senator from Utah did charge up against the bill these evils, but he is of the opinion that so long as the entire question of railroad regulation is before the Senate, the removal of the abuse ought to be made complete and effective.

I want to call attention, in view of what has been said by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], to a remark made by the court in reference to certain discriminations that exist in his section of the country. In the case of Behlmer against Louisville & Nashville Railroad the court said:

> The appellees contend that the smaller charge for the greater distance is in this case of great importance to the city of Charleston, as well as to the section of country adjacent thereto, as by means thereof the merchants of that city are enabled to build up a trade that would otherwise be lost to them.

The city of Atlanta might be substituted for the city of Charleston, and we would have the case existing then in the Senator's own State.

But the court goes on to say:

> That may be true, but is not the same argument applicable to Summerville and other interior cities along the line of the roads operated by the appellees between Charleston and Memphis? In order to build up one locality we should not tear down many others.

That, in a nutshell, is the entire case.

Perhaps a clear understanding of the enormous unjust burden which is placed upon the great interior country can be obtained from specific figures and from a mere statement of general principles, so I wish to call attention to certain specific rates upon a few of the principal commodities.

Mr. WATSON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator intend to press the long-and-short-haul provision to a vote to-day?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That depends upon circumstances. I have not considered the question. I assumed that it would take its natural course and come up when the debate is finished.

Mr. WATSON. When the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] left yesterday he requested me to say——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no desire to deprive any Senator of the opportunity of debating the matter, but I prefer to take that question up at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should be very glad if the Senator would now indicate whether he will ask for a vote upon his amendment to-day. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has just referred to the absence of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is deeply interested in the amendment. The Senator from Washington must realize that this is one of the most important provisions in the bill. The amendment would make a very radical change in the present law.

A great many Senators on this side of the Chamber, to my knowledge, are very deeply interested in the amendment, both pro and con. Some of those who are deeply interested against the amendment did not expect action upon it to-day and are not present. I wish the Senator from Washington would indicate whether it is his purpose when he finishes his argument to ask for a vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will take that up with the Senator at the conclusion of my remarks. I should like to have the matter discussed and disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. To my knowledge there is a desire to discuss it by a number of Senators who are not now here. We would be treating them with some degree of discourtesy if we should attempt to force the amendment to a vote this afternoon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not said anything about forcing it to a vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know the Senator has not, but I just want an expression from him that he will not.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should prefer while presenting the matter, which the Senator from North Carolina says is one of the most important parts of the bill—and I agree with him in that respect—not to interfere with the consideration of it by the Senate by an agreement that we are not going to act on it at a particular time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want any agreement not to act on it as soon as we possibly can do so. I only indicated that I would like an expression that we are not to act upon it to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think we ought to proceed with it in the ordinary course. I do not want to do any injustice to any Senator by unduly pressing it. It is very likely that there will be considerable debate on it by Senators. I am satisfied there will be, and I should be glad to confer with the Senator a little bit later about the matter of an agreement postponing the vote upon it.

Mr. KING. I should like to say to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that yesterday the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] offered the amendment and was prepared to discuss it and ask for a vote then. At my request, as I recall, action was deferred until to-day. The motion to amend made by the Senator is in the RECORD, and the Senator made a brief statement which appears in the RECORD, a brief statement indicating his position and indicating, of course, that he would ask for a vote upon the amendment at an early opportunity.

I merely say that to indicate that there has been no purpose upon the part of the Senator from Washington to take snap judgment upon anybody.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not intimating in any way that there has been——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I decline to yield any further at this point.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator let me make one observation in reply to the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will make it brief——

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I will not make it if the Senator objects.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I prefer to take up the matter at some other time than in the midst of my effort to present my argument on the amendment.

I was proceeding to point out some specific abuses, specific rates, and the communities which suffer from them under the existing law, which would be removed by adoption of the amendment.

Quoting from the report of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate in the last Congress, I read:

> This resulted in some instances in the interior point being charged a rate double that which was charged the terminal point, and in practically all cases, before recent modifications were secured, a very much larger rate than was charged to the terminal point, although the interior point was a much shorter distance from the point of origin and the service rendered by the carrier correspondingly less.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment and I will yield.

> Goods such as structural steel, dry goods, canned goods, wire fencing, nails, iron pipe, and practically all commodities manufactured in the East or Middle West, passing through the railroad yards in Spokane, Boise, Denver, Reno, etc., in carload lots, and carried from 300 to 800 miles farther, over rivers and mountain ranges, to the ocean terminal, were charged a lower freight rate, 50 or 75 or a greater per cent less, than if the same goods, in the same car, were unloaded in the same freight yard at the interior point through which they passed en route to the terminal. A carload of coffee from New Orleans to Portland by way of Spokane, reconsigned en route so as to be delivered in Spokane instead of being hauled 350 miles farther to Portland, bore a higher rate of freight than if carried on and delivered in Portland. Prior to December 31, 1916—

It is to prevent a return to these conditions that the amendment is sought—> the rate on a carload of structural steel, minimum weight 60,000 pounds, from Pittsburgh, Pa., to Portland, Oreg., or Seattle, Wash., was $390 at 65 cents per hundred. In being transported from Pittsburgh to Portland or Seattle this car passed through Spokane. If the same car were consigned from Pittsburgh to Spokane the rate was $585 at 97½ cents a hundred, although the transportation company was saved the expense of hauling this 60,000-pound car 350 miles farther to the Pacific coast terminal, crossing, in the case of consignment to Seattle or Tacoma, the great Cascade Range of mountains. A carload of canned goods, 36,000 pounds minimum weight, from New York to the Pacific coast terminal bore a rate of $270; for the shorter distance to Spokane it bore a rate of $396. A carload of paint, 40,000 pounds minimum weight, from New York to Seattle or Portland, bore a rate of $300; to Spokane of $440; of twine, 40,000 pounds minimum weight, from New York to the Pacific coast, $300; to Spokane, $440; of wire fencing, 50,000 pounds minimum weight, from Pittsburgh, Pa., to the coast, $375; to Spokane, $500; of butts and hinges from the same point, 50,000 pounds minimum weight, to the coast, $375; to Spokane, $500. A carload of dry goods or cotton cloth from New York, 36,000 pounds minimum weight, at 90 cents a hundred to the Pacific coast terminal, bore a rate of $324; to Spokane a rate of $1.25 a hundred, amounting to $450. A carload of nails, 80,000 pounds minimum weight, from Pittsburgh, Pa., at 65 cents a hundred, had a rate to Portland and Seattle of $520, to Spokane at $1 a hundred, or $800 per car.

I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that he was reading from a report of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, made at the last Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice it stated that the rate was about double in some cases. I want to call the Senator's attention to a case that came under my personal observation. The last time I went to San Francisco to buy wool for the Provo Woolen Mills I purchased four carloads of wool. I went up to the Southern Pacific Railroad and asked, What is the rate on wool to-day? They said, "75 cents a hundred." I said, "I have four carloads that I desire to ship." "Where do you want to ship it, to Boston or Philadelphia?" I said, "No; I want to ship it to Provo, Utah." "Oh, well, then the rate is $2.25 a hundred"; in other words, one-quarter of the distance and three times the amount. That is the condition under which we have been living in the intermountain country for a great many years. There is an overall factory at Salt Lake City, and whenever a carload of denim is shipped from New York to Salt Lake City $400 a car more must be paid than if it were shipped through Salt Lake City to San Francisco. Mr. President, I could stand here all day long and cite similar cases.

I thought we had this matter settled years ago when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and some others of us made a fight for this very thing, but when the bill went into conference the whole provision was changed. The language was so rewritten that it amounted to nothing. So I hope, with all my heart, that the Senate of the United States will adopt the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Washington and that when it goes to conference nothing will eliminate it from the bill.

There is nothing in connection with railroad transportation that is more detrimental to different sections of the country than the practice of such discriminations as have just been pointed out by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for the clear statement which he has made. It brings out the fact that this is such an obvious injustice that there can not be any combination of circumstances which would justify it. It is contrary to the fundamental principles of Government; and I have thought—I have not undertaken to work out the legal proposition and I do not know that any success could be achieved by so doing—but I have thought that it was contrary to the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to every citizen equal protection under the law, to charge him or his community more for a less service on the part of a public-service corporation under the regulation of the Government than is charged to his fellow citizens for a greater service; to charge more for hauling goods a short distance than is charged to his competitor for hauling them a long distance.

It is very true, as the Senator from Utah has stated, that it was expected at the time of the amendment of the interstate commerce act in 1910 that this abuse would be abolished, but that by reason of modifications in conference those hopes were disappointed and the old abuse remained. The same thing is true, Mr. President, as to the expectation aroused on the occasion of the passage of the original act of 1887. There are incorporated in the report of the committee, which I have inserted as a part of my remarks, extracts from the debates, including the statement of Senator Cullom, of Illinois, at the time of the passage of the interstate commerce act in 1887 chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, who was one of the conservative members and rather inclined to take the railroad viewpoint of those matters, believing it to be for the best interests of the country, that it was intended to remove this discrimination; but he said that there might be some exceptional cases in which, for a particular reason, such a general rule would work injustice. So they put in the exception; but the exception ate up the law. The result was that the abuse became universal, and there is not a point upon a river or upon the seacoast which receives goods by the long haul, at the terminus of the line, that has not set up a claim to a beneficial and a discriminatory rate under this exception which was vested in the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and there is not an interior point in the great area outside of the official classification territory that has not suffered the consequences of it.

Senators from New England are opposing this amendment, and yet if this rule, from which the South and the West are suffering, were applied in New England it would be impossible to maintain throughout the New England States, upon every watercourse where originally water power was used but now principally steam power, the factories which have made that region the greatest manufacturing center of the Union.

New England is not suffering from this abuse. A Senator from New England asked a moment ago if this would not establish a mileage basis of freight rates, indicating a misconception which has been in many instances propagated throughout the country for the purpose of maintaining the advantages which certain cities are enjoying under the present rule. All of the great manufacturing territory east of the Mississippi and north of the Potomac River has been built up by a removal of these discriminations. It would be impossible for Moline, Ill., or Rockford, Ill., to maintain the great factories, to employ the thousands and tens of thousands of people in those cities and similar cities in that section if the city of Chicago enjoyed a greatly lower rate, or even if it enjoyed a slightly lower rate, upon raw materials than is enjoyed by Rockford, Moline, and other smaller towns where such factories are located. It is only by reason of equitable rates, it is only by reason of establishing the principle of uniformity, that manufacturing has been distributed throughout that section of the country, that employment has been given to all of those communities, and, as a result, the metropolis itself has grown greatly by reason of the development of the surrounding tributary country.

As further illustrating the abuse, I wish to call attention also, in addition to what I have just read, to the fact that the great State of Idaho, which is a wool-producing State, is unable to develop a wool market or a wool-compressing industry, or even to ship its product at a favorable rate to the wool markets of the East because of the discriminatory freight rate, because of freight rates which give Portland, Oreg., 500 miles farther west, a very much lower rate upon wool to the great wool market of Boston. Wool is shipped from the sheep ranges of Idaho to the Pacific coast and there baled and reshipped back through the very territory where it originated to the consuming market in the East. That is a waste of transportation; it is an injustice to the people of the interior sections of the country to take wealth out of those sections, concentrate it in another section of the country by reason of an artificial advantage which they derive from governmental regulation, when it ought to be the purpose of the Government to avoid such abuses and to secure just and equitable treatment.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if a citizen of Utah desires to purchase the pelts of sheep or the hides of cattle, the only way he can do so successfully is to move to Los Angeles, Calif. A man dealing in hides and pelts living in Los Angeles can come into Utah, buy the hides and pelts, ship them from Utah to Los Angeles, and then reship them from Los Angeles to the East, and make a profit on the transaction. A merchant is not supposed to go into the business of purchasing pelts and hides in the State of Utah or to be on an equal footing with the same kind of a merchant in Los Angeles, Calif. The railroads say otherwise; they want the business to go to Los Angeles and therefore they arrange, through the freight rates imposed, that it shall go there, and they make it profitable for it to go there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, to cite some of these rates, Portland, Oreg., is 500 miles farther from Boston than Boise, Idaho. And yet the rate on baled wool from Portland to Boston, unless it has been recently changed, is $1.25 a hundred pounds, and from Boise to Boston it is $2.14 a hundred pounds. The rate on wool in sacks from Boise to Portland is 96½ cents; so that wool can be shipped from Boise to Portland, 500 miles west, and reshipped from Portland to Boston for $2.21½ for the entire transportation, whereas the direct shipment from Boise to Boston, 1,000 miles less, is $2.14. It is perfectly manifest that no wool-baling industry can be developed at Boise, although it is in the center of the wool-producing section of the country.

That was a case presented at the time the report to which I have referred was made, and I am not sure whether the conditions exist at the present time, because there has been some effort on the part of the Railroad Administration to remedy the most flagrant of these abuses. The entire section of the country which I have in mind has struggled, to my knowledge, for 25 years to throw off this blight of discriminatory railroad rates, and struggled unsuccessfully, until the Railroad Administration in certain sections—not everywhere—taking advantage of the fact that on account of the war, what little transportation had existed through the Panama Canal had been cut off and there could not be raised the excuse of water competition, because there was not a single ship plying between the two coasts through the Panama Canal, removed this abuse. The purpose of the amendment is to establish in the law the principle of uniformity so that communities in this country, including many great States and various great sections, will not have staring them in the face the prospect of a reestablishment of these discriminations.

It is obvious that if a man who is considering the establishment of an industry or the enlargement of a business in which he is engaged does not know that he will continue to receive equitable treatment with regard to freight rates it is impossible for him to secure the capital to carry on his business or to make a success of it, and it is only when uniformity is fixed in the law that his business will be put upon a permanent and successful basis.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask, for my information, whether this condition of which the Senator speaks—the much higher rate from, say, Idaho to the East than from the coast to the East—is a condition that has existed only during the Government administration of the railroads or whether it antedated that time?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It antedated that time. It has existed ever since railroads were built into that country, or very shortly after that time.

Mr. KNOX. Do not the Interstate Commerce Commission have the power to regulate that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. They have not done it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They not only have not done it but they have perpetuated the abuse, and have taken positions in the past—from some of which they have gradually receded—which made the injury which resulted from the discrimination far beyond anything that could have been conceived as probable. It has not only injured immediately the communities that suffered from the high freight rates but it has had the effect of preventing the development of coastwise shipping and of river shipping.

We have spent in the neighborhood of a billion dollars in the improvement of waterways in this country, and yet, as a result of this one proposition of permitting railroads to meet water competition or under the principle which was adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission of meeting imaginary water competition, called potential water competition, no boats are plying upon the waterways which have been constructed at such great expense. It has had the effect of retarding the development of great sections of the country and of congesting business in certain populous centers, with consequent increased expense to the people and increased cost of production. It has had the effect of putting a blight upon waterway transportation, of which, now that business has increased and the volume of transportation is greater than the railroads can care for, the country is very much in need.

I may say in further answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania, repeating to some extent what I had already said, as shown by the debate in the Senate when the interstate-commerce act of 1887 was being discussed, that it was thought at that time that the fourth section of the interstate-commerce act removed this abuse; but that has been an absolute disappointment and illusion, because they put into the fourth section, which laid down the identical rule which I am seeking to have established as the law, an exception allowing the Interstate Commerce Commission in special cases to grant exceptions to the fourth-section rule, with the result that the exceptions have become the rule, and there are no cases in which either water competition or railroad competition exists in which the rule is not entirely nugatory.

Mr. HENDERSON. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the same conditions referred to as existing in Idaho also exist in Nevada, Utah, and other Western States? That practice is pretty general and uniform throughout the West.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; and it exists also throughout the South.

Mr. HENDERSON. Throughout the South.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The only section of the country that does not suffer from it—and to that it owes its prosperity, in large part—is the North and the East, what is called official classification territory.

To illustrate the way in which this rule is applied to one section and not to another section, I have just stated the discrimination in rates, eastbound, as between Portland, Oreg., and Boise, Idaho. Now, anyone would think that if that principle is to be applied on the ground of water competition, the same discrimination would exist in those shipments as between Pittsburgh and New York, for instance, or Pittsburgh and Boston. In shipments from the West passing through Pittsburgh, say, on the Pennsylvania Railroad and going to New York, you would think New York would get a low rate and Pittsburgh a high rate, because New York has the benefit of water competition and Pittsburgh has not; but no such rule is applied in the East.

Pittsburgh gets at least as low a rate, and perhaps a lower rate, than New York does; but when you reverse the consideration, as to the great volume of manufactured goods which goes to supply the population of the Mountain States and those of the Pacific coast, you will find that all of the intermediate points pay a much higher rate than the terminal points. If we are going to have that sort of a principle it ought to be applied universally. One section of the country ought not to be relieved of it and other sections of the country suffer from it.

Senators upon the floor here from the South oppose this amendment; and yet I think you will find that in every case where a Senator is opposing it he has a city in his State, perhaps the largest city in the State, that has the good end of this proposition, that is enjoying the low rates and using its influence to prevent the removal of this benefit.

The railroads have succeeded by this system in driving off the boat lines and removing that great competitor. It is perfectly natural that they should desire a system by which they can suppress the rival transportation system. We spent $350,000,000 in digging the Panama Canal. One of the principal purposes of the expenditure of that money was to secure cheap transportation between the Pacific and the Atlantic; and yet, as is pointed out in detail in the report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in the last Congress upon this same bill, boat transportation through the Panama Canal has not been developed, but has been suppressed and rendered impossible because of the system of meeting water competition by putting railroad rates down to a point where the boat lines could not compete.

When the railroads do this they have to make up the difference somewhere. If the railroads, in order to drive off ship lines, are allowed to put their rates down to a point which they claim, at least, and which the Interstate Commerce Commission recognizes as being so low that it would not pay interest on their bonds or dividends upon their stock, they could not operate the railroads under that system.

They have to get the money from some source, and so they get it by raising the rates at the interior points, and so far as net profits are concerned, if we accept the statement of the railroads that these low rates to the coast are merely sufficient to make a little profit on the out-of-pocket cost—that is, on the cost of the transaction itself—and not to earn interest upon bonds or dividends upon stock, the entire net earnings of the railroads come from the interior of the country, which, as I said a moment ago, could never exist and prosper even to the extent that it has prospered under such a system if it had not been for the enormous variety and extent of its natural resources, the great herds of cattle, the great volume of agricultural products, the enormous values of lumber and of minerals, the indigenous treasures of its soil and climate, from which it has received a share, notwithstanding the undue portion which was extracted from it in discriminatory rates and all the consequent injury that comes from that abuse. Not merely $11,000,000 a year in excess rates which the intermountain States pay measures the extent of the injury which they suffer from this discrimination. In addition to that there is the retardation of their development, the destruction of the prosperity of their business, the impossibility of the establishment of business in competition with a community which has a more favorable rate under the sanction and authority of the Government.

I speak with perfect freedom about this matter because I am not situated as some Senators are whose constituency is entirely in an interior State and is suffering as a whole from this discrimination. I represent in part a State which ought to be a great maritime State. It is a maritime State, but its maritime interests have not been developed as they should have been nor as they will be in the future if shipping had not been and is not to be paralyzed by this system of discriminatory rates which rendered its full development impossible.

I think that approximately two-thirds of the population of the State of Washington are tributary in their business and industrial dependence upon the terminal cities which look out upon the sea from which should come the full complement of their growth. But, aside from the injury to those cities themselves of this system, which deprives them of that resource which should be the chief glory in their development—their maritime interests—and deadens a full hemisphere in the circle of their resources. I object to this inequality because of its inherent injustice, by which under governmental protection, by governmental fiat, there is favoritism shown one community as against another in the operation of a public service to whose support all contribute alike.

One peculiar feature of this matter is suggested by the reflection that the appropriations which we have made from year to year in the river and harbor bill, carrying from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000—and which I have favored as a general principle because I have believed in water transportation in its necessity for the carrying of the heavier forms of freight to supplement the railroads—have been paid in large part by the interior sections. And yet while they have been taxed for the purpose of improving the waterways and developing the harbors the fact that we have those waterways and the fact that we have those harbors is used as a reason for imposing excess freight rates upon them!

In the matter of water competition, Mr. President, which is urged as the principal ground upon which this discrimination is allowed to exist, it is quite an interesting circumstance that in the excess rate which is charged to the intermediate point upon a westbound shipment, the greater part of the transcontinental railroad line over which that shipment goes receives no part of the excess, but the benefit of the excess rate is confined to the lines west of the Mississippi River. To illustrate that, and to show how much of a hollow pretext, so far as actual competition is concerned, this theory of water transportation is, I will quote the statement of a witness before the committee, Percy P. Powell. He says:

> The rate on canned goods from New York to Spokane is $1.10 per hundred, and the minimum is 60,000 pounds. The revenue on a car of canned goods from New York to Spokane on that minimum is $660, whereas the rate to the Pacific coast, which is 85 cents a hundred with the same minimum, produces a revenue of $510, the rate to Spokane earning $150 more than the rate to the Pacific coast. The carriers earn $150 more by dropping that commodity at a point 342 miles closer than the Pacific coast point of destination. This revenue is divided as follows: The lines east of St. Paul on the Pacific coast traffic receive $180.38 and the lines west of St. Paul receive $329.62. On the Spokane traffic the lines east of St. Paul receive $180.38, which is identically the same amount they receive if the car goes through to Seattle or the Pacific coast terminals, and the lines west of St. Paul on that same traffic receive $479.62. Now, whether this car of canned goods is subject to water competition or not, the eastern lines, or the eastern carriers, deliver that car from New York to St. Paul at exactly the same rate. * * * The excess freight we pay on those goods is paid the western line that hauls the car from St. Paul to Spokane, and Commissioner Prouty, and in fact all the orders of the commission, have stated absolutely that water competition does not exist between St. Paul and Spokane.

That raises the question, Mr. President, of whether or not a railroad line, not from New York to Seattle but from St. Paul to Seattle, half of the distance, is not able to compete upon a basis of rates made under the general rule of rate making, that rates shall be fair and reasonable, with a water line shipping goods from New York, formerly around Cape Horn—for this abuse was at its worst excess before the Panama Canal was opened—or, since the canal was opened, shipping them from New York through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast. The fact of the case is that the railroads can compete with the water lines at a profitable rate. The water lines would have difficulty in getting their share of the business even though the railroads were not subsidized to the extent of the $11,000,000 annual excess freights levied upon the intermountain country.

When you charge the intermediate point an excess rate in order to enable the railroad to meet water competition at a terminal, even supposing that it is necessary in good faith that it should have a low rate that it is thereby enabled to make at the terminal, that amounts to a subsidy to the railroad company to enable it to meet water competition; and it is a subsidy that is not paid by all the people, but collected from those who instead of being penalized, if there is to be a discrimination in rates at all, should have the lower rate, as they have the shorter haul. But it is for the purpose of putting all upon an equal basis, and not giving any the advantage, that this amendment is proposed.

[Senate Report No. 756, Part I, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session.]

LONG AND SHORT HAUL RAILROAD BILL.

"Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 313:

"The Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 313) to amend section 4 of the act to regulate commerce passed February 4, 1887, and subsequent amendments thereof, have thoroughly considered the same and recommend that the bill do pass without amendment.

"From March 13 to March 21, 1918, the committee held extensive hearings on the bill and representatives of the coast terminal cities, acting through their chambers of commerce and other commercial bodies; of the interior communities, particularly those from the so-called intermountain country; of the ship lines and others directly interested in the development of intercoastal water transportation and of transportation by river and canal, as well as representatives of rail transportation companies, particularly the transcontinental lines reaching the Pacific coast, testified at length. Every phase of the question involved in this bill was thoroughly covered and the hearings were printed in a single volume of 733 pages, which is hereby referred to and made a part of this report.

"The bill as referred to the committee is as follows:

"A bill (S. 313) to amend section 4 of the act to regulate commerce passed February 4, 1887, and subsequent amendments thereof.

"Be it enacted etc., That section 4 of the act of Congress of February 4, 1887, to regulate commerce, and as subsequently amended, be, and the same is hereby, further amended so as to read as follows: 'It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through route than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act, but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

"Whenever a carrier by railroad shall, in competition with a water route or routes, reduce the rates on the carriage of any species of freight to or from competitive points, it shall not increase such rates unless after hearing and an order granting permission therefor by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"This act shall take effect 60 days after its approval by the President.

"Section 4 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, was as follows:

"That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

"On June 18, 1910, this section was amended so as to read as follows:

"That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through route than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the Interstate Commerce Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section: Provided further, That no rates or charges lawfully existing at the time of the passage of this amendatory act shall be required to be changed by reason of the provisions of this section prior to the expiration of six months after the passage of this act, nor in any case where application shall have been filed before the commission, in accordance with the provisions of this section, until a determination of such application by the commission.

"Whenever a carrier by railroad shall in competition with a water route or routes reduce the rates on the carriage of any species of freight to or from competitive points, it shall not be permitted to increase such rates unless after hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission it shall be found that such proposed increase rests upon changed conditions other than the elimination of water competition.

"The substantive part of this section 4 of the act to regulate commerce has come to be designated in the administration of the act and in the discussion of questions arising therefrom as 'the long-and-short-haul clause.'

"It will be noted that the essential change made in section 4, with which the pending bill is concerned, by the amendment of June 18, 1910, was the elimination from the section of the words 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions.'

"The amendment of 1910, however, retains in the section the proviso:

"That upon application to the Interstate Commerce Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property.

"The pending bill, S. 313, is intended to further eliminate from section 4 this last-quoted proviso, thereby removing from the Interstate Commerce Commission any power or jurisdiction to grant to the carriers any exemption from the long-and-short-haul provision or to make any exception thereto. If enacted, this bill will make the long-and-short-haul clause absolute, unconditional, and mandatory in all cases.

"As the act was originally passed it came to be construed in the practice of the carriers and also by the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission in effect not to be applicable in any case where the 'circumstances and conditions' were not 'substantially similar,' and that the carriers themselves might be the judges in the first instance, subject, of course, to the revision of the Interstate Commerce Commission of whether or not the circumstances and conditions were substantially similar. Also, in practice and under the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it was held that at any point reached by a railroad where there was also water transportation, either actual or 'potential,' the circumstances and conditions, within the meaning of this language as used in section 4 of the act, were not substantially similar to the circumstances and conditions at any interior point reached by a railroad where there was not water transportation, either actual or potential.

"Under this practice the railroads were free to charge and receive greater compensation for the transportation of passengers and of like kind of property (meaning property transported a greater distance over the same lines, etc., of like kind as that transported the shorter distance) for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance in every case where the destination of the shorter haul was in the interior and not upon a navigable canal or river. The same ruling and practice was adopted as to 'rail competitive points'; that is, the carriers were permitted to charge less for the transportation of freight or passengers to a point where there was competition by other railroads than they charged for the transportation of passengers or the same kind of freight to intermediate points on the line. The result of all this was that the fourth section of the act to regulate commerce became substantially and to all intents and purposes in the actual transportation of the country null and void and of no effect whatever, except in the very limited field not affected by rail or water competition in the comparison between the longer and the shorter haul.

"The enactment of section 4 was the result of a recognized and long-standing evil. It was regarded as one of the most important features of the act. It was intended primarily to secure what the Supreme Court of the United States has declared (Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U. S., 426, 439, and other cases) to be the great end and object of governmental regulation of interstate commerce, viz, uniformity of rates and service. The court said:

"That the act to regulate commerce was intended to afford an effective means for redressing the wrongs resulting from unjust discrimination and undue preference is undoubted. Indeed, it is not open to controversy that to provide for these subjects was among the principal purposes of the act. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Ry. Co., 167 U. S., 479, 494.) And it is apparent that the means by which these great purposes were to be accomplished was the placing upon all carriers the positive duty to establish schedules of reasonable rates which should have a uniform application to all.

"The object was to secure to the entire country the benefits of this public service of transportation upon equal terms and conditions and without discrimination between communities. Another object of the enactment of the fourth section was to protect those engaged in the business of transportation upon our rivers and canals and in our intercoastal water-borne commerce from unfair and destructive competition of the railroads, and the consequent rail monopoly of substantially all the transportation of the country.

"Under the construction of the act referred to above and the practice which grew up thereunder both of these objects were completely defeated. Lower rates, both passenger and freight, were made by the railroads to so-called 'water competitive' and 'rail competitive' points than to intermediate points on the same line. This principle was carried to extravagant lengths.

"Transportation from such interior points as Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Paul to Pacific coast terminals, such as San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle, in which there was no water competition whatever, nor, so far as practical operation was concerned, any even 'potential' water competition, was treated as subject to water competition; and for that reason it was held that transportation from the points named to the Pacific coast terminals was not 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions' as transportation of the identical kind of freight or passengers from the same points, over the same line, in the same direction, to intermediate points in, for instance, what in the discussion of this question has come to be designated as the 'intermountain country,' such points as Spokane, Salt Lake, Denver, Reno, and hundreds of other communities in these great interior States. The same rule was applied on transportation from New York and all Atlantic coast points. In many instances the comparative rate to the several western points mentioned was based on the theory that the goods were transported to the terminal on the Pacific coast and back again to the interior point, and a rate was made to the interior point equal to the rate from the point of origin in the East to the Pacific coast terminal and the local rate from the terminal back over the same line to the intermediate point.

"This resulted in some instances in the interior point being charged a rate double that which was charged the terminal point, and in practically all cases, before recent modifications were secured, a very much larger rate than was charged to the terminal point, although the interior point was a much shorter distance from the point of origin and the service rendered by the carrier correspondingly less. Goods such as structural steel, dry goods, canned goods, wire fencing, nails, iron pipe, and practically all commodities manufactured in the East or Middle West, passing through the railroad yards in Spokane, Boise, Denver, Reno, etc., in carload lots and carried from 300 to 800 miles farther over rivers and mountain ranges to the ocean terminal, were charged a lower freight rate, 50 or 75 or a greater per cent less, than if the same goods, in the same car, were unloaded in the same freight yard at the interior point through which they passed en route to the terminal. A carload of coffee from New Orleans to Portland by way of Spokane reconsigned en route so as to be delivered in Spokane, instead of being hauled 350 miles farther to Portland, bore a higher rate of freight than if carried on and delivered in Portland. Prior to December 31, 1916, the rate on a carload of structural steel, minimum weight 60,000 pounds, from Pittsburgh, Pa., to Portland, Oreg., or Seattle, Wash., was $390 at 65 cents per hundred. In being transported from Pittsburgh to Portland or Seattle this car passed through Spokane.

"If the same car were consigned from Pittsburgh to Spokane the rate was $585 at 97½ cents a hundred, although the transportation company was saved the expense of hauling this 60,000-pound car 350 miles farther to the Pacific coast terminal, crossing, in the case of consignment to Seattle or Tacoma, the great Cascade Range of mountains. A carload of canned goods, 36,000 pounds minimum weight, from New York to the Pacific coast terminal bore a rate of $270; for the shorter distance to Spokane it bore a rate of $396. A carload of paint, 40,000 pounds minimum weight, from New York to Seattle or Portland bore a rate of $300; to Spokane of $440; of twine, 40,000 pounds minimum weight, from New York to the Pacific coast $300; to Spokane, $440; of wire fencing, 50,000 pounds minimum weight, from Pittsburgh, Pa., to the coast $375; to Spokane, $500; of butts and hinges from the same point, 50,000 pounds minimum weight, to the coast $375; to Spokane, $500. A carload of dry goods or cotton cloth from New York, 36,000 pounds minimum weight, at 90 cents a hundred to the Pacific coast terminal, bore a rate of $324; to Spokane a rate of $1.25 a hundred, amounting to $450. A carload of nails, 80,000 pounds minimum weight, from Pittsburgh, Pa., at 65 cents a hundred, had a rate to Portland and Seattle of $520, to Spokane at $1 a hundred, or $800 per car.

"The same discrimination, varying somewhat in amount and degree, existed on practically every important article of transportation and consumption. These instances are cited merely as illustrating the general situation which existed throughout the great region referred to. It may be well, however, by way of emphasizing the fact and the extent of this inequality of burdens for the service of the great public utility of railroad transportation between different communities, all entitled under the general theory of our Government to equal rights and uniform consideration under the law, to cite the rates on wool from the great wool-producing intermountain country to the principal wool markets, such as Boston. Portland, Oreg., is 500 miles farther from Boston than Boise, Idaho, and yet the rate on baled wool from Portland to Boston is $1.25 per 100 pounds; from Boise to Boston $2.14. The rate on wool in sacks from Boise to Portland is 96½ cents; so that wool can be shipped from Boise to Portland, 500 wiles west, and reshipped from Portland to Boston for $2.21½ for the entire transportation; whereas the direct shipment from Boise to Boston, 1,000 miles less, is $2.14. It is perfectly manifest that no wool-baling industry can be developed at Boise, although in the center of the wool-producing country, under these circumstances. (Hearings, p. 248.) We will not burden this report at this point with further details of rates, but refer to illuminating tables of rates, showing the universal character and extent of the discrimination referred to, printed in the hearings mentioned above.

"It is manifest that the great interior country, suffering from these discriminations, can not be developed to its full capacity under such a system. A very slight discrimination in transportation rates is enough to destroy or suppress a business or an industry. These discriminations and unequal burdens are overwhelming, and if continued will keep the people of the interior in a perpetual state of economic and industrial bondage. It is not a question which concerns jobbers and transportation companies alone, but affects every consumer, which means every individual in the community. The people of the small communities and the interior sections necessarily import the greater part of the necessities, utilities, and comforts of daily life. A very essential part of the cost of living, which affects the conditions in every home, is the cost of transportation. If the people in one community are to live and labor under an extra burden of this cost, which is as much a tax as the revenues paid to the Government, as compared with their fellow citizens in another community for the same service, it is manifest that they will be kept as to their conditions of life in a position of inferiority. They are denied an equal opportunity in life. Furthermore they are deprived of that "equal protection of the laws" which is one of the fundamental principles of our institutions. The cardinal principle of just taxation is that the tax shall be uniform. It is as essential that rates paid for a public utility, such as railroad transportation, operating under a Government franchise, exercising by governmental permit a function of government, and subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal control over interstate commerce, should be uniform as any tax paid directly into the Public Treasury itself. Citizens denied this protection and equality of status under the law can not develop themselves into the full stature of citizenship. The unequal treatment referred to above has been borne with patience by the people against whom the discrimination has been directed, although they have struggled constantly for relief. They have been sustained in the struggle by the constant expectation of an early remedy, either through the enactment of law or the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"In this they have been disappointed, notwithstanding the various efforts of Congress to relieve the situation by the enactments referred to above. It can not be expected, however, that these communities, representing in the aggregate by far the greater part of the country, will indefinitely tolerate such discriminations. By their industry and by the natural wealth and resources of the land they possess and which they have reclaimed, notwithstanding the handicaps under which they have labored, they have increased in power and influence and are rapidly arriving at the point where it will not be necessary for them to petition longer, but where they will be able to demand their rights. As stated in the hearings by Hon. A. L. Freehafer, member of the Public Utilities Commission of Idaho:

"The plea that we wish to make to you to-day is that we shall simply be granted justice. As I said before, we are happy. We are fairly prosperous in our interior country; but so was the negro slave under his master in the South; but this country was not, indeed, a country of freedom until that slavery was abolished; and while we, of the interior of the West, are compelled to pay tribute to the Pacific coast, this country is not a land of equal opportunities. We ask, gentlemen, that you enact this bill into law in the light of that sacred principle of American democracy—equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

"As indicating in a practical way the effect of these discriminatory rates, Mr. Freehafer, among many other illustrations, stated this (hearings, p. 239):

"Suppose we were putting in a water system in the city of Boise, now a city of about 25,000 people. We figure that it would cost us nearly $50,000 more for freight on our piping for that water system than it would cost the city of Portland, located 500 miles farther west. That $50,000 must be reflected in our rates that we pay for water, and it is a perpetual tax upon the citizens of that city, and we are handicapped to that extent from developing our country. As mentioned here yesterday, by Mr. Campbell, a little iron bridge over Priest River in northern Idaho cost $1,500 more for the freight than the same bridge would have cost if it had been over on the coast somewhere; and the farmer's wagon and his wife's range and all of those things are subject to that handicap over the coast, so that we can not develop. We can not build up under those circumstances.

"Not only the so-called intermountain country of the West is laboring under this unjust burden, but the South and the Southwest is likewise in varying degrees, according to locality, thwarted in its aspirations and suppressed from growth and from the enjoyment of its legitimate opportunities by a similar discrimination under the long-and-short-haul system of imposing upon the vast interior country higher rates than those charged at the terminal points. To some extent, but to a much less extent, the same condition exists in the North and Northeast. In the latter section industry is more widely distributed, the country is more generally developed, and it would not tolerate the discrimination from which the South and West suffer. As stated by Mr. Freehafer (hearings, p. 239):

"It has always appeared to us strange why the railroads did not insist upon this policy on eastbound traffic to the intermediate points. Why do they not say to Pittsburgh or Cincinnati or Columbus, Ohio, 'You must pay higher rates than the through rates to New York'? Why don't they say when we are shipping wool, for instance, that 'We will charge you $1.50 to Pittsburgh, but we will carry it through to New York or Boston for $1'? You can imagine what kind of a howl would go out from those eastern intermediate points. They would not stand for it a minute; but because we are young and weak we have been standing it these many years and expect to continue to stand it under the present circumstances and conditions.

"As indicating the vast extent of country suffering from these discriminations, reference is made to a comparative table of rates submitted by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and printed on pages 114 to 118 of the testimony. As stated by Mr. J. B. Campbell, a thoroughly well-informed witness, at the hearing:

"You will notice that this gives the rate to the coast, the maximum rate to the intermediate point, the rate to Spokane, Butte, and other interior cities, and also shows how far back east the railroads practice the charging of more than to the coast cities. Take, for instance, the first item of carpeting: The rate to the terminal was $1.25, the Spokane rate from New York was $1.56, and a higher rate was charged to Fridley, Minn., from New York than was charged to the Pacific coast, though the distance to Fridley was twelve hundred and some odd miles shorter than from New York to Portland.

"It is a curious outcome of this rate discrimination against the intermediate points and the great interior country that the very fact that they are required to pay a higher rate for nearly every article of use and consumption inevitably automatically keeps them in such a position that they are compelled to continue to import those commodities, thereby not only being compelled to pay an extra rate for their transportation but losing the employment and consequent accumulation of wealth and improvement of conditions of life which would come from the production or manufacture of these articles in their own communities. In other words, they pay high rates because they do not manufacture the commodities, and they can not manufacture the commodities because they pay high rates on every article necessary for such manufacture. The consequence is industrial stagnation and paralysis of the great interior of the land.

"The corollary of this is the unnatural concentration and congestion of population and industry at the points having the lower rates. Last winter when the country was confronted by a great crisis and the very existence of the Nation depended upon transportation there was a blockade of the main arteries of commerce because there was a congestion of traffic and an accumulation of cars, locomotives, and ships at the great terminal points, which the Railroad Administrator recently likened to a 'log jam' or an 'ice jam' in a river. This ominous and dangerous situation was due to that system of rate making which, by giving lower rates to certain points than are given to others, tended toward the centralization of industry and population. The wholesome citizenship of the Nation is to be found more largely, perhaps, in the villages and country communities, and it is here, in the midst of their farms and small towns, that they should be enabled to develop their civilization and accumulate its comforts. Here in many instances is to be found the raw material which enters into manufacture. Here is greater space of soil and air and more opportunity for diversified movement and occupation than in the crowded quarters of the great cities, and yet, because of discriminatory transportation rates, people seeking employment must add still further to the congestion and social problems of the great cities, because industry has been centered there through this very discrimination. The relief of this situation in the future development of our population is the removal of the discrimination and the giving of equal opportunities, so far as rates are concerned, to the great interior.

SUPPRESSION OF WATER TRANSPORTATION.

"The country has expended approximately a billion dollars in the improvement of rivers and harbors and the construction of canals. This has been raised by taxation of the Federal Government and States, and, to some extent, by voluntary contributions. The greater part of it has been paid by people who do not reside upon the harbors or waterways. And yet, although they have been taxed for these facilities, the waterways, when secured, have been used as the excuse for imposing discriminatory additional railroad rates upon the very people who largely paid for the improvements. In many cases the waterways have served for no other purpose than as such an excuse; that is, there is little or no water transportation upon them. The reason of this is that the railroads by their system of rate making and by arbitrary discrimination against shippers patronizing water routes and by refusal to give joint service, either as to rates or the handling of freight itself, and by refusal to make physical rail connection with the waterways, have prevented or destroyed water transportation on most of these lines. It is proved by the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission that the railroads have been permitted to make such rates at 'water competitive' points as would meet not only actual water competition but 'potential' water competition, and the effect of this has been that water transportation has been impossible in most instances, although it is a notorious fact that it is cheaper, as to actual cost, than rail transportation. By this means the people have been largely deprived, so far as river, canal, and coastwise shipping is concerned, of the benefits that should have accrued from their great expenditures for the improvement of these waterways. It is pointed out by witnesses that in the early days of railroad operation, immediately after the construction of the great railroad lines, there was but little freight, and the roads were eager to get all the transportation that existed and to make it as near a monopoly as possible, and, rather than operate at less than their capacity, they found it desirable to make whatever rates might be necessary to get the business. As the country has developed, however, and population has increased, business has far outrun the capacity of the railroads.

"The consequence is shortage of cars and locomotives, inability of shippers to get cars for loading, delay of transportation, blockade of traffic. There are periods even now when it is impossible for those great trunk lines, which heretofore have sought to exclude competition and to absorb all the business there was in sight, to transport the freight which is offered for shipment. The tendency of the situation is still more in that direction. The increase of our population and of our business, including transportation, is going on at a greatly accelerated rate. It will be from year to year immensely greater per annum in absolute quantity, even if the percentage of increase should remain the same in the future as in the past. From this it is easy to be seen that the existing railroads or any additional number which there is reasonable prospect of being constructed, will have great difficulty in handling the business. The obvious remedy for this is to follow the example of older industrial countries such as France and England, which have developed their water transportation facilities, have protected them from unfair methods of competition, and find them absolutely essential in meeting their transportation needs, especially as to bulkier commodities and raw materials. We must do the same, and in order to do it the first step is to abolish a system of railroad freight rates by which the roads are permitted to make a rate to a water competitive point covering only a small margin over what is called the 'out-of-pocket cost' or, in other words, the mere cost of operating the train and handling the freight, without any margin to pay interest upon bonds or stock. They have been permitted to adopt this policy under such a system of calculation that they were able to drive water competition out of business. Auxiliary to this, of course, were other discriminations, such as refusal to furnish joint rates, through service, necessary physical connections, etc. The most important, however, was the system of low railroad rates at the terminals and the privilege of making up the necessary railroad revenue by higher rates in the interior. By this system not only was water competition driven out of business, but the intermediate points and the great interior of the country were compelled to bear the entire burden of providing the revenue to maintain railroad capitalization. This is simply another phase of the injustice and unequal protection of the law referred to above.

"In the case Fourth Section Violation in the Southeast (30 I. C. C., pp. 262–263) the Interstate Commerce Commission says:

"The rates made to Memphis via the steamers to New Orleans, thence by rail, referred to in the preceding paragraph, were advanced in 1898 to 100, 85, 65, 45; 38, 32.

"These rates were continued until December 5, 1910, when they were canceled, so that at present there are no through rates via New Orleans to Memphis. Neither is it true at present that there is any regular water service between New Orleans and Memphis, and there are no through all-water rates open to the shipper, such as were in effect at the time of the report above mentioned. It can not, therefore, be asserted that there is any actual active water competition existing at present between New York and Memphis. There is a disconnected service between New Orleans and Memphis, regular boats plying between Natchez and Vicksburg and Memphis. The water competition is to be regarded as potential but not actual, and the testimony in this case indicates that any material advance in the rates from New York City to Memphis would without doubt result in reestablishment of active competition on the Mississippi River.

"This is equivalent to saying that an active water transportation can not be established if the railroads are allowed to maintain the discriminatory rates, and, strange to say, this is the reason given for allowing them exemption from the fourth section.

"The refusal to enforce the long-and-short-haul clause here because its enforcement 'would without doubt result' in restoring water transportation to the river is obviously equivalent to permitting the railroads to make such rates as will, in connection with the other practices mentioned above, entirely prevent the development of transportation by water in competition with rail. This has been the actual result throughout the country by which water transportation between the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts, much of that on the South Atlantic coast, and on the rivers and canals of the interior has been largely destroyed.

"It has been testified that some years ago the merchants of San Francisco put several ships into the Atlantic-Pacific trade in order to secure lower rates of transportation. They operated them at a loss of several hundred thousand dollars. The result, however, was that the railroads lowered their rates to San Francisco, and, although the ship line was abandoned, the testimony was to the effect that the loss in its operation was much more than compensated by the lower rates made by the railroads. Of course, whatever inadequacy of return the railroads received on this business was made up by the higher rates to the interior and by the added transportation which they acquired by the system of developing the terminal points as distributing centers, carrying goods from the point of origin to the terminus of the line and then collecting high local distributing rates for carrying the same goods back over the same line to the intermediate points, through which they had originally passed on the way to the terminus, instead of being delivered to the ultimate consumer directly and by the shortest haul.

"The country is interested in the most economical use of its transportation system. One of the most important features of this is the delivery of freight by the shortest and most direct line. The system of rates allowed under the interpretation of the fourth section as it stands at present has the opposite effect, and the result is that the great mass of commodities consumed in the interior is carried the greatest possible, instead of the shortest possible, distance in order to reach the end desired. This decreases the efficiency of our transportation system and renders it inadequate to meet the demands of the country when traffic is at its peak. Such a system can not be continued if the long-and-short-haul clause is made absolute as proposed by this bill. Under the old system, even where the goods were not actually carried to the terminus and back again to the intermediate point for distribution, yet the freight rate to the intermediate point was based upon the theory, fictitious though it was in most cases, that this had actually been done. By this means the railroads receive compensation in enormous amount for services which were never rendered, imposing an annual and unnecessary tax of many millions of dollars upon the great interior country. As pointed out above, under conditions of increased traffic, this was an injury to the efficiency of the road as well as to the interior country. It was also an injury to the terminal cities, because it prevented their maritime development. Our coast cities should all be thriving centers of water-borne coastwise traffic. As a matter of fact, they are ports in name only, so far as any substantial amount of domestic commerce is concerned.

"We are entering upon a new era in international affairs. It is absolutely necessary that we should build up a mercantile marine. We have a statutory monopoly of our coastwise shipping, and this affords the Nation a magnificent opportunity to develop mercantile pursuits, industrial employment of our people in shipyards, and the creation of a nursery for sailors and seamen to man our fleets both in peace and war, in commerce, and in the Navy. The unfair system of competitive railroad rates, which were competitive in name only, because, as clearly demonstrated, they were really prohibitive of water competition, if allowed to continue or to be reestablished, as may be the case if the fourth section of the act is not amended, will make this impossible in the future as it has been in the past. By making the fourth section long-and-short-haul clause absolute and unconditional railroads will be compelled to charge a reasonable rate at terminals and at interior points in order to earn necessary returns upon capital invested, and water lines will have an opportunity to compete. There will be ample business for all and a certain quantity of business, for various reasons, will always go by rail, even though the water rate should be lower.

"We built the Panama Canal both as a military facility and as a means of transportation between the two coasts. If the old system of railroad rates is continued, by which the roads are allowed, as stated in the case cited above, to make rates where there is 'potential' water competition which will prevent actual water competition, the $375,000,000 expended in the construction of the Panama Canal will be almost useless so far as any commercial benefit is concerned, since the railroads will effectually prevent its substantial use for water transportation between our Atlantic and Pacific ports.

"Certain representatives of Pacific coast cities have argued that they are entitled to preferential railroad rates as against the intermediate points with a shorter haul because of the natural advantage and superiority of situation of the coast cities. The advantage, however, which they derive from a railroad rate so low that it pays barely more than the out-of-pocket cost is not a natural advantage. It is purely artificial. It is a Government favor and it is bestowed upon them by governmental permission in violation of the fundamental rules of uniformity of rates, of equality of taxation, and of equal protection of the laws. There is nothing natural about it. It is altogether unnatural. The real natural advantage which the Pacific terminals should enjoy they have been deprived of by this system. That advantage should be water transportation. That, however, has been driven away by this artificial and discriminatory system of rates.

"The real, natural advantage of the Pacific coast cities is the ocean. No one can deprive them, nor will undertake to deprive them, of this advantage. They have not enjoyed it so far as coastwise shipping is concerned because of destructive, discriminatory, unequal, and prohibitive railroad rates. No greater impetus can be given to the industrial and commercial development of Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, St. Louis, Memphis, St. Paul, Cincinnati, and every other city which to a greater or less extent has the natural opportunity of developing a water-borne traffic than to remove the restrictions which have prevented its use. The ports of the Pacific with their great harbors should become thriving centers of maritime activities of all kinds, and will so become when the proper encouragement is given those who are ready and willing to invest in ships for the coastwise trade and to build ships for that purpose, by the guaranty they would have from the enactment of this law that they will not be discriminated against by what amounts to an enormous subsidy to the railroad lines levied upon the consuming public of the interior.

"The debates in Congress upon the amendment of June 18, 1910, to the fourth section show clearly that the purpose of the amendment was to do away with the injustice and evil effects of the discrimination in rates referred to above, and it was thought that as framed it would have that effect. The phrase 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions' was omitted from the act. The purpose of the authors of the amendment was to change the ruling and practice by which water competition was considered such a dissimilar 'circumstance and condition' as to, in all cases where it existed, either actually or potentially, authorize a lower rate for the long haul than for the shorter haul to a point where this did not exist. There could have been no other object, since there was no substantial and widespread complaint of any other application of this section. As an extra precaution, however, the proviso was retained, giving the commission authority 'in special cases' to exempt the carrier from the terms of the section, the object being to allow some discretion to remedy some special case which might arise under peculiar and unforeseen conditions. In practice, however, this proviso has eaten up the rest of the law. The proviso has become the controlling and absorbing feature of the long-and-short-haul clause, and there is nothing else left of it, or was not, until the ruling going into effect March 15, 1918, by which, on account of all coastwise water transportation between the Pacific and Atlantic ports being eliminated by the slides in the Panama Canal, followed by the complete absorption of shipping in the war, the long-and-short-haul clause was applied to westbound traffic to the Pacific coast. To all intents and purposes the fourth section of the original act of 1887 was rendered null and void in practice by the controlling effect given to the words 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions' and to the discretion and use of the same vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission by the proviso. The only change in actual results accomplished by the amendment of 1910 was that under the original act of 1887 the railroads of their own initiative could assume for themselves the license of charging less for the longer than for the shorter haul, whereas under the amendment they were compelled to rely upon the proviso alone and to appeal, in the first instance, to the discretion thereby vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"This, however, was a mere matter of procedure, and under the general rule and practice adopted by the commission it made no substantial change in the actual results so far as discriminatory rates were concerned until the order mentioned above, going into effect March 15, 1918, under a holding that water transportation, both actual and potential, had ceased to exist at that time and that consequently the circumstances and conditions at the coast were substantially similar in this respect as at the intermediate points. From this it will be seen that up to the time of this relief the evident purpose of both the original section and the amendment of 1910 was defeated.

THE PRESENT SITUATION.

"While, by the recent order just mentioned, temporary relief has been granted to the intermountain country as to west-bound rates, the old condition of gross discrimination still exists in many other sections. And even as to the intermountain country the discrimination on east-bound traffic still remains; and while the relief as to west-bound traffic, even though temporary, is most welcome and beneficial, it can not have its full effect until it is made permanent. On its present basis and under the ruling and practice which has been developed under the existing laws the old discriminations may return at any time, as they have continued to exist in many points of the South and Southwest. With this uncertainty and the experience in the past, the 38-year struggle for relief, the disappointments, the suppression of growth, and the destruction of infant industries which struggled to establish themselves in the interior country, and disasters still fresh in the memory of the people, it can not be expected that capital will be invested in industries at these intermediate points throughout the interior country with the fear of a return of the old discriminations at any time ever present with them.

"Established conditions and reasonable certainty of the future as to equal treatment in the matter of comparative, whatever the absolute rates may be, are necessary to induce people to invest their capital and to devote their time to the establishment of manufactures, of jobbing trade, and of industrial development generally. If this bill, making the long-and-short-haul clause absolute, as enacted, removing the discretion vested in the commission to grant exceptions to it, industry will have a substantial basis on which to develop and a new era of prosperity will begin throughout the vast region where so many futile attempts have been made in the past; so, also, it may be said as to the establishment of ship lines on the coast, when ships are available and the Panama Canal is open for continuous business. Money and effort will not be invested in the establishment of these lines with the knowledge that under the existing law as determined by previous practice the railroads will be permitted to make competitive rates which the boat lines can not meet and prosper. As in the case of industry in the interior, however, if assurance is given by the enactment of an absolute long-and-short-haul clause that this unfair and discriminatory competition of the rail lines will not be permitted in the future the coastwise shipping trade will have an opportunity to live and flourish with consequent benefit to the coast cities and, by reflex action, to the entire adjacent territory.

"If this bill is enacted into law it will apply to rail competitive as well as to water competitive points. Under the law as it stands now the Interstate Commerce Commission, under discretion vested in it in the proviso which was retained in the amendment of 1910, have allowed the railroads to charge less for a long haul to a point where two or more railroad lines competed for business than for a short haul over the same line, in the same direction, to an intermediate point where there was no such rail competition. This followed the construction given to the original act of 1887, to the effect that under these circumstances there were not 'substantially similar circumstances and conditions' at these several points, and, although this latter clause has been eliminated, it was still given as much effect as it had before it was repealed, or at least the conditions which resulted from it continued the same as they were before. It is argued by some that this discrimination in the case of rail competitive points as against intermediate points without rail competition should be allowed to continue, as otherwise a long and expensive line, competing with a short and inexpensive line at a junction point, could not get a share of the business. This does not follow by any means, as rates at the competitive point can be adjusted upon a reasonable basis for all concerned, and it is not fair that those communities at intermediate, noncompetitive points should be mulcted in damages in order to enable the road on which they are situated to carry freight at a lower rate for the longer haul so that it may compete with another railroad at a more distant point. The fundamental principles of uniformity of rates for the service rendered to the different communities and patrons of the road are the same here as elsewhere. These principles are universal, and should be absolute and mandatory in application. Otherwise a circuitous line operating over a difficult and expensive route would be in effect subsidized by the discriminatory high rate which it would be enabled to charge to its patrons at intermediate points, and thereby put upon an equal footing in all respects as to earnings and dividends with a direct line operating over a more advantageous natural route.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

"We insert here an excellent statement of the principles involved in this bill by Hon. O. P. Gothlin, formerly chairman of the Public Service Commission of Ohio, and formerly president of the National Association of Railway Commissioners, and at present chief of the tariff bureau of the Public Service Commission of the State of Indiana:

"I desire to express my emphatic indorsement of Senate bill 313 and my sincere hope that it may become law. Permit me to quote from a letter I wrote last fall to the conference committee on national preparedness, New York City:

"'I have read with interest your recent circular, more particularly that part of it relating to the development of water transportation.

"'Kindly allow me to suggest that the first step in the direction of water-carriage development is to persuade the Interstate Commerce Commission to change its attitude toward the enforcement of the fifth section of the act to regulate commerce. The persistent violation of the intent of this section has made river traffic in the United States so unprofitable that it has almost ceased to be a factor in the commercial world. The act to regulate commerce was amended in 1910 to nullify the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Alabama-Midland case (168 U. S., 144), wherein it was held that competition between a steam line and a water line at a destination point created dissimilar conditions and circumstances that justified the rail carrier in charging higher rates to intermediate points than to the destination point. The words, "similar conditions and circumstances" were eliminated from the fourth section by the act of 1910, but the Interstate Commerce Commission was clothed with power to grant authority to rail lines to make lesser rates to destination points than to intermediate points when the situation justified. They have been so lavish in bestowing this authority that the general situation is just about the same as it was prior to 1887. In other words, the legislation intended to accomplish a good purpose has availed little because not enforced.'

"In the above case cited (168 U. S., 144) this language occurs: 'When the rates to Montgomery were higher a few years ago than now, actual water-line competition by the river came in, and the rates were reduced to the level of the lowest practical paying water rates, and the volume of carriage by the river is now comparatively small.'

"A sad commentary. What became of the river transportation? Destroyed by rail competition, and to do it the rail line had to make rates that were noncompensatory, and consequently to apply unduly high rates to unprotected intermediate territory to recoup. A most unjustified economic waste. This is illustrative of the situation over the United States.

"So long as the rail lines may drive water lines out of existence by unfair competition—that is, by unduly low rates to competing points, and are allowed to make up the deficit by unduly high rates to the intermediate points—there can be no development of water transportation facilities. In the whole field of transportation no practice has been of so great an influence for evil as that of discriminating against unprotected local territory that the carriers might enjoy the privilege of destroying water traffic.

"Within the past two years the Interstate Commerce Commission issued an order authorizing the transcontinental lines to establish to Pacific coast ports rates lower than in effect to intermediate points, and as justifying the decision recited in the opinion that the opening of the Panama Canal would reduce the cost of water transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards. This is the very reason why the transcontinental lines should not be allowed to make lower rates to Pacific coast ports than to intermediate points. The Federal Government expended millions in the construction of the Panama Canal for the very purpose of fostering water traffic between the Atlantic and the Pacific seaboards, and by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission this expenditure was in vain so far as development of water transportation is concerned. Of course, the canal is a military necessity and the expenditure is justified for that reason alone. Nevertheless the intention was also to foster and develop ocean transportation.

"So long as the transcontinental railroads may establish unduly low rates to the Pacific coast and make up the deficit by correspondingly high rates to intermediate territory, capital dare not invest in ships. Rail rates should be adjusted so as to place all territories served on a relatively equitable basis and return a reasonable margin of profit to the carrier. When a railroad charges more to transport a ton of freight to Salt Lake City from Chicago than it charges for the same ton to San Francisco, 50 per cent farther, either the Frisco rate is unduly low or the Salt Lake City rate is unduly high. A railroad must sell service at prices that will return revenue sufficient to pay operating expenses and a reasonable profit. Of course, if some service be sold at a price that returns a margin of only 5 per cent, or no margin at all, some other service must be sold at a proportionately higher than reasonably profitable price or there is a deficit. Why should rail carriers be allowed to levy an undue tax on intermediate territory to enable them to transport to water-competing points at unprofitable rates for the purpose of crippling water transportation?

"Many years ago, when the great State of Ohio embraced within its borders but a fraction of its present population, it exhibited a most remarkable spirit of enterprise by constructing a magnificent system of canals. When railroad transportation came into the field, far-seeing statesmen enacted a long-and-short-haul law for the very purpose of protecting the waterways constructed at so great an expense. But the law was never enforced and canal transportation was killed. Had the Ohio long and short haul been properly observed Ohio would now have an effective transportation system independent of and supplemental to the rail service that has not been able to keep up with the demands of commerce. As a result of the failure to enforce the law, the once magnificent system of canals has decayed into a condition of innocuous desuetude.

"There is another point of view from which this question should be considered. The nullification of the fourth section intent by administrative action fosters and encourages circuitous transportation, a deplorable economic waste. No other single influence has operated so extensively to deplete the available car supply. It is undoubtedly true that the transportation of freight over the United States to-day involves at least 40 per cent of unnecessary mileage, which is an economic waste of power and an unnecessary detention of equipment and produces a total operating cost far beyond what it would be were carriers required to use direct routes.

"The public is entitled to the advantages of both boat and rail transportation, and each class is entitled to fair pay for the service rendered. Now, when the rail lines can not adequately meet the transportation demands, we are feeling the effects of the attitude of regulating bodies toward water transportation in the past, and the effects are serious. Instead of having ample water-carriage facilities to supply the deficiencies of rail carriage when they are badly needed, we find a woeful lack of them. The first step toward a rejuvenation of water transportation is to enforce the fourth section of the act to regulate commerce in accordance with the intent of Congress when it was enacted.

"Since the enactment of the act to regulate commerce in 1887, violations of the long-and-short-haul principle have not obtained to any great extent in that part of the United States where the density of traffic is greatest; that is, north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers from the Mississippi River to the east line of New York. Such a policy on the part of the carriers would not be tolerated. To illustrate: Were rates to and from the very large number of manufacturing centers located within 100 miles of Chicago graded 10, 20, or 25 per cent higher than to and from Chicago, those centers would be depopulated. It would be necessary for the carriers to establish limits circumscribing the favored territory. Any line so established would be extended here and there as the power of the affected interests dictated, until in time it would be abolished entirely; because each extension would afford incontrovertible argument to the industry just beyond, that it must be taken in to eliminate the obvious discriminatory situation.

"No legislature, court, or commission has the right to require one man to pay any part of another man's transportation tax. Rates made to terminal points that yield less than a fair margin make it absolutely necessary to impose at other points rates that pay more than a fair margin or there is a deficit. Railroads must earn from the rate of service revenue sufficient to pay operating expenses and a reasonable profit on investment. If some transportation is sold at prices that do not so yield, the deficit must be made up in some way, and the only way it can be made up is by unduly taxing other patrons.

"The grand aim of regulation is to eliminate discrimination, and the greatest discrimination in the whole field of transportation is the result of the gross violations of the long-and-short-haul principle permitted by regulative bodies misled by the subtle sophistries of those desiring to profit by the loss of others.

"The Federal Government would not undertake to confer a jobbing monopoly upon particular commercial centers and prohibit wholesale dealing at all other places. The public would not stand it; yet the carriers in some localities have arrogated to themselves the right to do that very thing. By their rate structures they have said to certain centers, 'You may have the reshipping monopoly for the territory we have assigned to you,' and have enforced their edicts by so adjusting rates as to make it impossible for other centers to compete. The deplorable fact is that this arbitrary assumption of undue and unjust power has been not only condoned but affirmatively indorsed by the tribunal erected for the purpose of protecting public rights.

"Economists have for years warned us against the evils of aggregating great populations in cities. Were it possible to apply universally throughout the United States the policy of imposing higher rates to the intermediate territory than to favored terminals, commerce and manufacturing would naturally gravitate to those favored centers. It could not be otherwise. With the national freight-rate structure framed on sane principles, the population will naturally distribute itself so as to form a wholesome, healthful, economic organization, nowhere unduly dense, nowhere unduly sparse, supply within reach of demand, transportation conditions simplified, congestion eliminated.

"If Senate bill 313 becomes a law its salutary influence will be felt almost immediately, more especially, of course, in those localities now suffering from the maladministration of carriers and regulative bodies. Territories which have existed in spite of adverse conditions will flourish under natural conditions.

"It is to be deplored that it be necessary to pass this bill; that existing law has not been administered as Congress intended. Legislation has done its share toward sane and just regulation, but the administration of regulative law has failed. The results of such failure are grievously unjust conditions; the divesting of some localities of their natural advantages that artificial advantage might be conferred upon other localities. It therefore becomes necessary to make the long-and-short-haul mandate absolute, that even-handed justice may be obtained everywhere throughout the country.

"Chief Justice White, in the Intermountain Rate cases (234 U. S., 476, 482), said:

"Almost immediately after the adoption of the act to regulate commerce in 1887 the Interstate Commerce Commission, in considering the meaning of the law and the scope of the duties imposed on the commission in enforcing it, reached the conclusion that the words 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions' of the fourth section dominated the long-and-short-haul clause and empowered carriers to primarily determine the existence of the required dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions, and consequently to exact in the event of such difference a lesser charge for the longer than was exacted for the shorter haul, and that competition which materially affected the rate of carriage to a particular point was a dissimilar circumstance and condition within the meaning of the act. We say 'primarily' because, of course, it was further recognized that the authority existing in carriers to the end just stated was subject to the supervision and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the execution of the powers conferred upon it by the statute, and especially in view of the authority stated in the fourth section. In considering the act comprehensively it was pointed out that the generic provisions against preference and discrimination expressed in the second and third sections of the act were all embracing and therefore operative upon the fourth section as well as upon all other provisions of the act. But it was pointed out that where, within the purview of the fourth section, it had lawfully resulted that the lesser rate was charged for a longer than for a shorter haul, such exaction being authorized could not be a preference or discrimination and therefore illegal. In re Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. (1 I. C. C., 31).

"This indicated clearly how the fourth section not only failed to relieve the situation it was aimed at but also under the construction given it actually weakened the other sections of the act (the second and third sections), which by their prohibition of preference and discrimination would otherwise, perhaps, have been sufficient to prevent the abuses which have grown up under the construction given to the fourth section.

"In the same case, in defining the change made by the amendment of 1910, the Chief Justice said:

"It is certain that the fundamental change which it makes is the omission of the substantially similar circumstances and conditions clause, thereby leaving the long-and-short-haul clause, in a sense, unqualified except in so far as the section gives the right to the carrier to apply to the commission for authority 'to charge less for the longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of persons and property' and gives the commission authority, from time to time, to prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be received from the operation of this section.

"As has been shown above, this change has no substantial results, because the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the discretion vested in them by the proviso, adopted the same principles which had been given effect under the clause 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions' contained in the original act. So that, although the clause was left out, the effect remained the same as before.

"In Texas & Pacific Railway v. I. C. C. (162 U. S., 197, 222) it was said:

"The effort of the commission, by a rigid general order, to deprive the inland consumers of the advantage of through rates, and to thus give an advantage to the traders and manufacturers of the large seaboard cities, seems to create the very mischief which it was one of the objects of the act to remedy.

"In this same case Justice Harlan, in a dissenting opinion, Justice Brown concurring, page 247, said:

"I am unable to find in these sections (secs. 2, 3, and 4 of the interstate commerce act) any authority for the commission or for a carrier, subject to the provisions of the act of Congress, to take into consideration the rates established by ocean lines as affecting the charges that an American carrier may make for the transportation of property over its routes. * * * A discrimination between A and B in respect of charges for a like and contemporaneous service in transporting the same kind of property over the same route is an unjust discrimination, because it necessarily operates to give that one to whom the most liberal rates are given an undue or unreasonable preference or advantage over the other.

"In the same case Chief Justice Fuller, in a dissenting opinion, page 255, said:

"In my judgment the second and third sections of the interstate commerce act are rigid rules of action, binding the commission as well as the railway companies. The similar circumstances and conditions referred to in the act are those under which the traffic of the railways is conducted, and the competitive conditions which may be taken into consideration by the commission are the competitive conditions within the field occupied by the carrier and not competitive conditions arising wholly outside of it.

"In I. C. C. v. E. T., V. & G. Railway Co. (85 Fed. Rep., 107, 118) the court said:

"But the long-and-short-haul clause is only one of the specific provisions employed for the general purpose of the act. The third section underlies the fourth and supplies the principle on which it rests, so that if the literal construction referred to be put upon the fourth section the case would still be exposed to the third section, which forbids undue preference to one locality or the subjection of another to any undue disadvantage.

"These citations give a clear idea of the far-reaching effect the little phrase 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions' and the proviso vesting discretion in the matter in the Interstate Commerce Commission have had in undermining and defeating the most fundamental and prominent purposes in the enactment of the interstate commerce act.

"In the case of Behlmer v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. (83 Fed. Rep., 898, 907) it was said:

"The appellees contend that the smaller charge for the greater distance is in this case of great importance to the city of Charleston, as well as to the section of country adjacent thereto, as by means thereof the merchants of that city are enabled to build up a trade that would otherwise be lost to them. That may be true, but is not the same argument applicable to Summerville and other interior cities along the line of the roads operated by the appellees between Charleston and Memphis? In order to build up one locality we should not tear down many others.

"The evil effects of the application which has been given to the fourth section are very well stated in I. C. C. v. E. T., V. & G. Railway Co. (85 Fed. Rep., 107, 113), where the court in its opinion said:

"If the fact of such competition is allowed to become a dominating factor in fixing the relative charges of transportation to the different places along the lines, these communities where there is no competition must be blighted by the disadvantage with which they are burdened and the favored places grow prosperous in the sacrifice of others. * * * And public policy would also be advanced by the opposite course not only in the encouragement which would thus be given to the distribution of commerce and population, but also in extending the equality of privilege which it is one of the prime objects of legislation to promote.

"In the report of Mr. Walter Parker, assistant to the secretary of commerce for inland water transportation, for the six months ended December 31, 1917, referring to the effect upon water transportation of the exceptions granted under the fourth section of the commerce act, he says, on page 5:

"The inability of the railroads to finance the purchase of equipment in sufficient volume to make possible adequate expansion, even were the materials available, is obvious to every student of economy. This being true, resort must be had to other than the railroads if the transportation is to be so augmented as to serve without friction, inconvenience, and delay.

"The waterways—natural lines of least resistance—offer the only solution.

"Their immediate use, as an adjunct to the railroads, is handicapped—

* * * * * * *

"(6) By a railroad system which gives the waterside locality lower freight rates than are given inland localities, a system which has only just begun to be changed.

* * * * * * *

"It is my opinion that private enterprise and capital will restore commercial use of the inland navigable waterways only as a result (1) of the assurance of adequate protection of boat traffic from uneconomic railroad-rate competition (p. 10).

* * * * * * *

"The adoption of the five recommendations below will go far, I am convinced, toward producing the desired results:

* * * * * * *

"(3) That the Secretary of Commerce call the attention of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the fact that the Government's policy, growing out of the law relating to the making of railroad rates where boat competition is possible, is not yet specific or clear enough to insure popular confidence in the safety of water transportation companies from railroad-rate changes of an uneconomic character. The law permits railroad-rate reductions to meet new boat competition, but prohibits the raising of such rates should such new boat competition be removed. It is my opinion that the economy of transportation is now such as to very largely remove the old danger to boats of extremely low railroad-rate competition, but prospective investors in boat lines require specific assurance of this before they will regard investments of this character as attractive.

"Under the jurisdiction of the railroad-control act, the Railroad Administrator, representing the President, directed investigations to be made by the Army Engineers, who for years have had charge of the expenditure of appropriations made by Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors, of the relation of water to railroad transportation, and to make recommendations of measures for the coordinating of same, and the increased use of waterways to meet the war emergencies. After exhaustive studies of the subject under this authority, and having the benefit of years of familiarity with problems involved, Col. Charles Keller (now Maj. Gen. Keller), of the United States Army Engineers, testifying before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, printed under date of January 25, 1918, in the hearings of that committee, said:

"We already knew—we knew before we started—that there was little or no navigation. We also knew that there was comparatively little interest on the part of the various local communities that seemingly ought to be very much interested in river navigation. We found out that the causes for this condition were the familiar causes that had been reported by one commission after another (p. 6).

"And, second, there is the fear of hostility on the part of the railroads. It is possibly a familiar fact to this committee that the railroads do discriminate in their dealings with people who attempt to use our inland channels. * * * That they have the right to discriminate in this fashion no one will maintain, but that they practically do discriminate no one will deny. * * *

"But foremost of all, most fundamental of all, is the detrimental effect of the rail rates to river points. * * * I am convinced that no really successful navigation can be established unless the present structure of rail rates is completely revised, so as to take away from river communities those unjustly favorable rail rates that now exist and to distribute over the community in general, including the river communities, the burden of contributing adequately toward the support of railroads. At present the river communities do not pay their just share, and traffic is handled to river points at unremunerative rates. Of course, the ultimate effect of that condition is to render river transportation unprofitable and practically impossible. That fundamental cause of trouble was exposed many years ago, and has been emphasized again and again. There is no novelty in the conclusions to which I have come, and I will say that when I speak in the first person I speak the views of the committee. We believe that without this primary change in railroad rates comparatively little can be done to establish a really useful and prosperous traffic upon our inland navigation routes (p. 7).

"Now, then, visualized in that way, it becomes very plain that we need something in the way of additional law—I say that with apologies, because we already have a great deal of law—to establish an agency, I do not care whether it is the Interstate Commerce Commission or something else, that shall have its eye upon the general transportation problems of the country, and that shall have for its function the duty of seeing that the transportation system as a whole is the most economical that it can possibly be made to be. If we are right in believing as we do that the rivers have their proper place in an economical system of transportation, it should be the duty of this agency to see that the rivers get the traffic that they can handle more economically than it can be handled in any other way; but unless and until we have such an agency, and just as long as this discriminatory state of railroad rates and practice is permitted to continue, only in exceptional cases will any channel—any inland channel, I mean—that competes mainly with railroads that parallel both banks, let us say, be able to get any commerce at all. The conditions are such that every man who has business is practically afraid to use the river, even though deep down in his soul he may believe that the river is the economical route (p. 9).

"We have also, as I say, looked into the coastwise business and the possibility of putting to advantageous use the New York State Barge Canal, the Hudson River, and the Atlantic intercoastal routes. We find there the condition is much the same as it is in the central valleys. * * * We do know, however, from our investigations that the same underlying handicaps attend the New York State Barge Canal as attend the central rivers, and that the barge canal ordinarily can not do a large and profitable business except in connection with the railroads, under revised rates.

"While it is true that, on the present basis of railroad rates, general business can not profitably be done by the canal, on the other hand it is equally true that, with the breakdown of the railroads, business men are confronted with the question whether they should pay a higher rate to the canal and get their freight promptly or pay to the railroads a lower rate for a slow and undependable service. * * * The water routes, if properly used, certainly is the remedy for the breakdown of railroad transportation facilities (p. 12).

"The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Who fixes the rates that the barges receive for carrying this coal?

"Col. KELLER. The railroads virtually do. For example—I speak now in general figures; I did not arm myself with the precise figures, but the figures are approximately correct, close enough to the truth to illustrate the situation. The railroad freight rate on hard coal from the anthracite fields to Norfolk is between $2 and $3 a ton. * * * The railroad freight rate per ton from the anthracite fields to Philadelphia, where that coal might be transshipped to barges and from Philadelphia going to Norfolk by water, is within 50 cents or thereabouts of the rail rate to Norfolk. * * * Now, then, that determines what the barge shall get. The man who is buying coal in Norfolk is willing to allow the barge only the difference between the railroad through rate to Norfolk and the railroad local rate to Philadelphia—that is, 50 cents. The result is that the coal does not move by water. The barges have gone out of this coal business. This is the shortsightedness of the people. They do not fight against railroad rates when in normal times these rates favor the individual at the expense of the community. When things are abnormal, however, these rates may militate against the individual as well and damage his interests. We come back to the point that there is no prospect of large traffic on inland waterways until the rail situation is very radically revised (p. 13).

"Our remedy is to change the law, and that is perhaps more easily said than done. But I think that we all concede that this is the evil that must be cured, that railroads should not be permitted to discriminate in favor of certain communities and against others. That is what it amounts to. When they carry freight below cost to river points in any part of the country they must recoup themselves by getting an extravagant and unjust profit on some of the rest of the business, the business to inland points (p. 14).

"Col. Keller submitted to the committee, as a part of his statement, a memorandum on the 'Status and Needs of Inland Water Transportation in the United States,' which had been submitted by the committee of the Army engineers on waterways to the Council of National Defense. In this memorandum it is stated:

"The railroads to-day complain that their earnings do not form such a percentage on the money invested as to permit the normal amount of betterments and renewals to be made. Higher rates are demanded, and doubtless are needed, but if granted they should be gradually adjusted on the basis of public service rendered, founded on the cost of such service, and not by arbitrary charges (p. 29).

"The actual manifestations of this competition are best seen by examination of the appended table of rates now in force. The table shows, side by side, rates from river points to certain terminal points lying on rivers and to others at practically the same distance but lying inland. It is evident that, where even merely possible water competition exists, the rates are very low, whereas in the contrary case they are much higher. Just so long as the railroads are permitted to carry part of their traffic without the average profit and to reimburse themselves at the expense of the rest of the country just so long will the waterways have difficulty in carrying their just share of the country's traffic. We have been informed that in some cases the railroads intend now to raise abnormally low rates which are based upon merely possible, and not actual, water competition, but the readjustment so far appears slow. To the objection that raising of rail rates to water points will benefit only the railroads, the reply is that if rates to interior points are unduly high they should be reduced, and that, moreover, the water lines may be expected to charge rates at least as low as the present nominally competitive railroad rates, since otherwise the waterway will probably get none of the traffic in the present circumstances of location and organization of our mercantile community (p. 31).

"An example of these water competitive rates was recently brought to our notice by a river boat line, and inquiry showed that the rail rate on lumber from Arkansas City, where water competition may arise, to Cairo, Ill., is about two-thirds the rate from McGehee, Ark., an interior point, although traffic from Arkansas City to Cairo passes through McGehee. Rail rates from the lumber-producing territory in the vicinity of Arkansas City have recently been raised, but those from points having possible water competition still remain relatively low. Illustrations of this kind might be multiplied indefinitely (p. 32).

"At the hearings on this bill the only active opposition to its enactment on the part of the railroads was presented by the Southern Pacific Railway. This system, in so far as competition in transcontinental rates is concerned, controls the situation. A glance at the map will indicate that its rail lines from navigable water on the Pacific to its eastern port at Galveston, on the Gulf of Mexico, about the longitude of Omaha, is approximately one-half the length of the competitive port-to-port lines or systems operating between Atlantic and Pacific ports. Its connection with New York and other ports is maintained by a fleet of steamers which in 1917 contained an aggregate gross tonnage of 129,700 tons. This line was the gradual and prosperous growth and development of the old Morgan line, established by Mr. Charles Morgan in 1848, which operated small steamers between gulf ports. The Southern Pacific also owned the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. This company was originally organized in 1847 for the purpose of operating a steamship line between Oregon and Panama. It built three small schooners of an aggregate tonnage of 3,300 and attained great prosperity in the gold rush to California in 1850 and subsequent years. It increased its business and tonnage, with varying degrees of prosperity, until 1908, when it operated a gross tonnage of 95,600 tons. On account of the Panama Canal act prohibitions and other alleged reasons its tonnage was reduced in 1914 and subsequent years until 1916. In that year the capital of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was increased to $4,000,000, and three steamers of 5,700 tons each were purchased and its trans-Pacific service was resumed, with a total tonnage of 37,800 tons.

"The interest of this company in preventing the establishment of intercoastal ship lines, during the years when the system of discriminatory Pacific terminal rates were established and maintained on the so-called basis of out-of-pocket cost, is manifest; and the possibility of successful operation of American mercantile marine in foreign trade and of competition of boat lines in the coastwise trade with railway lines when the ship lines have the cooperation of connecting railway lines is demonstrated by the history of the Southern Pacific mercantile marine. The ability of this company also to make such Pacific terminal rates and to control the terminal-rate situation is evident by a comparison of its New York to San Francisco combined rail-and-water system, with the all-rail combination of railroad lines connecting these and other important Atlantic and Pacific ports. It is largely due to this company, with the powerful weapon of the permit given it in the operation and construction of the fourth section, the long and short haul clause, to reduce its terminal Pacific rates to such a point practically as it might see fit, or as might be necessary, to destroy or deter any rival water transportation. As pointed out by Mr. Frank Lyon in a brief filed in the so-called Transcontinental case before the Interstate Commerce Commission on behalf of the Luckenbach and other steamship companies, this privilege and power of the railroad company to lower its rates in its discretion because of potential water competition to such a point as would prevent the establishment of actual water competition, was an inexpensive and practically costless substitute which took the place, in the hands of the Southern Pacific Co., of the maintenance of actual competitive steamship lines in the all-water route. He says:

"In order to compete with the boat lines by the ownership of steamships would require the investment of a large sum of money, and to be effective would require the actual movement of freight via the boat line to the destinations proposed to be served. For instance, if the Southern Pacific were operating a boat line from San Francisco to the Atlantic coast to serve the ports of Charleston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, in order to be effective it would have to actually transport the freight to those ports in regular service in competition with other boat lines serving the same ports.

"Under the practice of securing relief from the fourth section, the Southern Pacific has been enabled to publish very low rates from San Francisco via rail to Galveston and thence by water to the ports named, and at the same time maintain no service. There has been no pretense of service via that line to Charleston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Boston since these rates were published, and the only shipments made have been several small lots into Charleston, Boston, and Philadelphia. The rates to the other ports as well as Charleston have been held as a club over any steamship company that desired to serve those ports. They could not do so with these published rates via the Southern Pacific, which could be made applicable any day that the Southern Pacific feared real competition of any independent water line. The publication of these rates is and always will be a menace to water lines serving these out ports, as they are termed. At one time it was the intention of the American-Hawaiian to develop business to Charleston and Boston, and the Luchenbach to Philadelphia, but the publication of these rates, which are applicable only when it suits the convenience of the Southern Pacific, forestalled and eliminated the efforts of the independent water lines to serve the out ports.

"Mr. Lyon also said:

"The uselessness of pretending to encourage a merchant marine is at once apparent if the commission has authority to permit rail carriers to make less than reasonable rates in order to take from that merchant marine the business which would otherwise come to it. * * *

"It is a matter of fact that the charging of less than reasonable rates between water points has had the effect of limiting the operation of boats. Whether this policy is to be continued may well address itself to the legislative department of the Government, and we submit should play its part before the commission when it has before it a question the determination of which marks the boundaries of our merchant marine. * * *

"The United States has expended about $400,000,000 in building the Panama Canal, and indications are that additional sums will be necessary for its completion. The steamship companies utilize the Panama Canal in transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The effect of granting those applications under the fourth section is to permanently turn business from the Panama Canal to the transcontinental rail lines. This may only be done by permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission. By granting this and like applications of the transcontinental lines, we respectfully direct the commission's attention to the fact that it is to a greater or less extent decreasing the use of the Panama Canal, thereby decreasing its revenues and thereby transferring the burden of its maintenance to the taxpayers of the United States generally, by requiring direct appropriations for the Treasury in order to continue its operation.

"That the special exemptions from the application of the fourth section granted to the railroads did and would have the effect of preventing altogether water transportation and that, notwithstanding such effect was expressly recognized, exemptions thereunder were granted, is shown, in addition to the case cited above, by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of Monroe Progressive League v. St. L., M. & S. Ry. Co. (15 I. C. C., 539):

"Complainant argues that, inasmuch as low rail rates have greatly reduced the steamboat traffic on the Mississippi River, water competition no longer exists at Vicksburg, and that, therefore, justification for the lower rates all rail from St. Louis to Vicksburg through Monroe is removed. The river, however, is still at Vicksburg, and any increase in the rail rates sufficient to induce the establishment of additional steamer lines would transform the diminished but strongly potential water competition into augmented active water competition which, once established, must continue.

"In the Nevada Railroad Commission v. S. P. Ry. Co. (21 I. C. C., 358), Commissioner Franklin K. Lane said:

"We have thus traced the history of this protracted struggle between the ocean and the land carriers that we might clearly appreciate the strategy of the railroads and its effect upon the ocean-borne traffic. One water route after another has been rendered innocuous. To meet the competition of the railroads the tendency of the ocean carriers has been to shorten the time consumed in passing by water from coast to coast. The clipper ship has been forced to give way to the steamship and the steamship has been compelled to transship by rail a portion of the distance. The routes by way of Cape Horn and Straits of Magellan have been virtually abandoned. For nearly 40 years the Panama route has been under railroad control. When an attempt was made to reestablish this route as a vital competitor the railroads used their own ocean and rail line to eliminate it from the field. * * * While they have subsidized, bought, and controlled the water carriers, there has always been present to the mind of the traffic manager of the transcontinental railroad the existence of the ocean and the possibility of its use. Without a ship upon it the ocean has the power to restrain, in some degree, the upward tendency of rail rates.

"It was thought that considerable advance had been made in freeing ship lines from the control of competitive railroad lines by the Panama Canal act. If, however, the competitive railroad lines can accomplish their purpose by making less than reasonable rates at the competitive points, or even by the permission and possibility of doing so, and can then reimburse themselves by higher rates at the intermediate points, and so destroy water competition or prevent its establishment, it is a far cheaper process for them than the control or ownership of actual ship lines to be maintained for the purpose of fighting off competitors. By this inexpensive process they can control competition through the Panama Canal, or any other waterway, and so render entirely useless the enactment of the law referred to, prohibiting them from owning competing water lines.

"In exempting the railroads from the operation of the fourth section the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the Louisville & Nashville case (31 I. C. C., 495), permitted lower rates from New Orleans to Nashville than to intermediate points on the same line, and states:

"While there is no sugar moving to-day between New Orleans and Nashville by water, still the river is navigable and there is a possibility of its moving that way.

"The effect of this is that while there was a possibility of it moving that way, so far as the physical conditions were concerned there was no possibility of it moving that way under the rate as permitted by the commission.

"In the case of Lake Line Applications under the Panama Canal act (33 I. C. C., 712) the Interstate Commerce Commission says:

"From an examination of the congressional debates from which the act emerged (referring to the Panama Canal act) it is at once clear that the spirit which undoubtedly prompted this legislation was a desire to preserve to the common interests of the people, free and unfettered, the "water roadbed" via the Panama Canal, which was nearing completion. Coupled as it is, the legislative purpose of the other parts of the amendment with respect to waters "elsewhere" must necessarily have been to restore all the water routes of the country to the same condition of freedom from any domination that would reduce their usefulness.

"Notwithstanding this recognition of the intention and purposes of this section of the Panama Canal act, the commission has permitted the roads, notwithstanding the long-and-short-haul clause, to make such rates as would prevent actual water competition where none existed but was only potential. Of course the same ruling would apply to the Panama Canal and utterly defeat the purpose defined by the commission in the passage just cited. In fact, the very existence of the canal itself, when open to traffic, was made by the railroads the basis of applications to the commission for further exemption from the long-and-short-haul provision of the fourth section, and in the case of the Fourth Section Application No. 205 et al. (32 I. C. C., 622) the Interstate Commerce Commission permitted the railroads to still further reduce their rates to the competitive water points and to maintain higher rates to the intermediate points for the express purpose of taking business from the Panama Canal, and rendered this opinion:

"We are of the opinion that these carriers should be permitted to compete for this long-distance traffic so long as it may be secured at rates which clearly cover the out-of-pocket cost.

"The railroads were permitted to fix rates to the coast that were admitted to be less than reasonable in order to take business from the Panama Canal. Under this a rate on structural steel from Pittsburgh to San Francisco was fixed at 65 cents per hundred pounds; while the rate to Reno, Nev., from Pittsburgh was fixed at $1 per hundred pounds, though the distance from Pittsburgh to Reno is 244 miles shorter than from Pittsburgh to San Francisco, and the shipment to San Francisco went over the same line as that to Reno and passed through Reno to its destination. Under this system, of course, the railroads secured the business which would otherwise have passed through the canal, and at the same time were relieved of the expense of operating a competing line of boats.

"The uncertainty which exists with regard to the matter, notwithstanding the order of the commission of June 30, 1917, which went into effect March 15, 1918, withdrawing exceptions from the fourth section in the Transcontinental Rate Case (41 I. C. C., 276), appears from that decision itself, as follows:

"When the water competition again becomes sufficiently controlling in the judgment of the carriers to necessitate the reduction of the rates to the coast cities to a lower level than can reasonably be applied at intermediate points, the carriers may bring the matter to our attention for such relief as the circumstances may justify.

"It is perfectly obvious that under this suggestion and invitation no security can be felt either by industry in the interior or by prospective ship-line investors on the coast; and, in order to enable either to operate, this constant menace should be permanently removed.

"In his report as Assistant Secretary of Commerce, cited above, Mr. Walter Parker says:

"At that time (the second stage of transportation economy in America) railroad expansion was proceeding at a more rapid pace than the commerce of the country was developing and railroad exploiters felt the necessity for controlling all of the commerce of the country and completely eliminating the boats as a factor * * * (p. 4).

"Under these conditions the railroads gained a practical monopoly of the country's transportation and enjoyed a period of great prosperity and attractiveness for the investor.

"Keen competition between the railroads and keen rivalry for the control of railroad systems resulted in short-sighted policies and the frequent and persistent violation of economic laws. Interior sections developed and began entering protests against the payment of rates high enough to offset the low rates given by the railroads to navigable water-served towns. * * * Commerce requiring transportation increased beyond the capacity of the railroads to conveniently and expeditiously move it (p. 5).

"In an address before the Boston City Club, April 11, 1918, Hon. George W. Anderson, late member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, said:

"But a large part—and I think the weight of opinion is, the larger part—of the decay of water-borne traffic has been due to artificially competitive rates. The long-and-short-haul provision of the interstate commerce act has been allowed to be set aside in order to meet water competition, and "meeting water competition" has commonly resulted in the destruction of water competition. During the last few years this destruction of water competition has reacted upon the carriers. When a rail carrier is saturated with traffic, additional traffic, causing congestion or a tremendous expense for new facilities, is disproportionately expensive and therefore unremunerative. Until about June 30, 1915, the rail carriers of the country wanted all the traffic there was. But during that year some of them became engorged, congested, overburdened. A large share of the locomotives which would normally have gone to our rail carriers went abroad. This made a bad situation worse. Then, almost for the first time in two generations, the American people awoke to the fact that they had been foolishly destroying transportation facilities furnished them by Divine Providence. Our canals have been in large numbers abandoned or little used. Canal transportation has been decadent from about 1840. So also as to our rivers and, to a large degree, to our coastwise transportation. * * *

"But, passing what we hope are the short-lived troubles of the war, the relation of rail transportation to a properly developed water transportation is of fundamental and permanent importance. As I probe deeper into the rate structure and try to analyze fundamental transportation facts I am surprised to find the extent to which the growth of large cities has been due to preferential rates. Railroad managers have come almost instinctively to regard water traffic as something to be done to death, fought without quarter. Remember that the railroads are now all under Federal control; that we have a unified national transportation system; that the Federal control act just passed by Congress provides in express terms, in section 6, for developing water transportation at the expense of the Federal Treasury; that for months the claim has been that we have not the facilities to handle our traffic.

"Yet my attention was recently called to certain evidence introduced by railroad witnesses in a case now pending. It was shown that the out-of-pocket cost of handling less than carload traffic at two terminals, plus the cost of a 10-mile haul, was about 30 cents for 100 pounds. In the same case the carriers asked the commission for permission to continue a rate for a haul of about 300 miles which was only about 1 cent higher than the 30-cent rate—this for the purpose of meeting alleged water competition. In other words, the carriers asked to be permitted to continue in traffic which admittedly paid them only 1 cent for an extra haul of about 290 miles. But this claim of the right to take traffic away from the water carriers, even at a loss, is typical of what has been going on for years, with results obvious to all.

"The destruction of water facilities is not the only untoward result of this unwise and injurious sort of competition. Rates, originally low but possibly remunerative, have given such advantages to certain advantageously situated cities that these cities have grown disproportionately, absorbing to themselves an overload of traffic with a resultant increasing terminal charge, generally absorbed by the carriers, so that it is plausibly claimed there are very many long through rates between our larger cities which, including terminal charges, show an actual, substantial out-of-pocket loss. Manifestly these railroads must become bankrupt or assess an unduly high charge upon intermediate and noncompetitive traffic. This results in subsidizing the undue growth of large cities and suppressing the proper growth of smaller cities and towns. I need not now dwell upon the disturbing social, political, and moral problems of our overgrown cities. We all agree that excessive urban growth is one of the evils of our modern society. In some of our cities the seemingly fundamental problem of housing the working population remains unsolved, and now confronts us as a war matter of first importance. Few people have had any adequate recognition of the extent to which that urban overgrowth has been caused by artificially competitive rail rates.

"In the hearings on this bill former Senator Joseph L. Bristow cited many illustrations of rate discriminations between communities in violation of the principle of the long-and-short-haul clause, and stated.

"There is not a small community in the United States that does not suffer as a result of this discrimination, and there are a vast number of large communities that are at the mercy of those that are still greater.

"He pointed out that the policy of the railroads was to acquire more transportation by a system of rates which encouraged the development of distant points on the long haul, at the terminals, necessitating a back haul and so much unnecessary haulage for distribution to the back country. This uneconomic system, which explains, in a large measure, both the congestion of cities and the breaking down and blockade of transportation referred to by Mr. Anderson, was described by Senator Bristow as follows (hearings, p. 65):

"The centering of the business that I am now discussing in Kansas City, so as to get this movement of live stock, and then the shipment of products—the manufactured meat, the dressed products—back into the country, 50 or 100 or 250 or 400 miles, as the case may be, creates a higher and better paying business.

"It gives them more profit out of the business. It develops transportation business for the carriers. Now, that system has prevailed throughout the United States, and it has resulted in the creation of a lot of unnecessary business, because it pays the carriers to handle it. * * *

"I think that the system of rate making, which has resulted in this congestion of business in great terminals, at the expense of the smaller commercial communities, has been very unjust. * * *

"The railways, by lessening the rates on competing water points, reducing them to a point where the water carriers could not accept the commerce and handle it, and then make up the loss, if loss there was, or penalize the communities that were not on water by excessive rates, have destroyed water competition.

"If that had not been permitted this Government to-day would not be required to spend a billion dollars to create a merchant marine. The system of rate making which has been recognized by the American people and recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission, has destroyed the American merchant marine absolutely.

"Hon. C. C. McChord, member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, recently a member of the Railroad Wage Commission, and one of the umpires of the National War Labor Board, in a thoughtful analysis of the problems to be solved by the Nation in the reabsorption into our industrial life of the demobilized Army, in a statement published July 28, 1918, states:

"What is needed in this country is a wider diffusion of manufacturing industries and the local supply of the necessaries of life. Products of our factories are distributed throughout the land, but under circumstances of economic waste as to demand a radical change.

"After describing the enterprising efforts of the Middle Western and border Southern States to develop manufacturing industries in the period of renewed industrial activity following the close of the Civil War, he calls attention to the tragedies and failures of so many of these undertakings, stating that there were various causes for their lack of success, but that:

"Most of them should have survived, and would have done so except that influences were at work that made success impossible. Among the chief of these was the fact that the railroads favored certain manufacturing centers in the way of facilities and rates. * * * Long hauls in large lots afforded attractive business that added to the aggregate of the returns to the carrier from his (the traffic manager's) efforts, and led to his preferment by those higher up in the control and management of the road.

"Competition for business at points reached by several railroads was keen and incessant. The more railroads that served a particular point the keener the struggle between rival traffic officials for business. For many years previous to 1900 and by many roads until 1906 rebates were paid to secure business to such an extent that officials have frankly admitted in evidence in proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission that few carriers pretended to collect more than 80 per cent of the advertised rates on shipments from competitive points.

"Railroads were built from business centers to business centers. Some reached the objective points by short direct routes, and others by long indirect routes. The latter in order to do business at the competitive points met the rates named by the short line, meanwhile maintaining higher rates at shorter distance points on their own lines.

"In the same way competition by boats on our inland and coastwise waterways was met by all-rail carriers until transportation by water, so far as our inland rivers are concerned, has been nearly abandoned. Cities and towns along these rivers, entitled to enjoy the cheaper water transportation, were deprived of the advantage of their location. * * *

"The result was that the factory in the small town ceased to operate and its employees were compelled to seek employment in the centers of production. * * *

"The result is that workmen and women in largest numbers live under conditions that are not sanitary, wholesome, nor conducive to good morals. This has happened in a country that is less densely populated than any of the great nations of the earth, and where there is room enough for every citizen and resident to enjoy his full share of pure air and sunlight and to live under conditions conducive to health, morality, and happiness. * * *

"There are many considerations that dictate a relocation of our manufacturing industries. * * *

"Thoughtful study should now be given to the equalization of rates for freight transportation and as to whether higher rates should for the future be permitted for shorter than for longer distances over the same line or route, the shorter being included within the longer distance, and whether combinations of rates and transit privileges that now unduly favor certain jobbing and junction points should be canceled and reasonable through rates established to all points. Transportation by boat on our rivers and coast lines should be encouraged to relieve rail carriers at congested cities and ports.

"The expectations of the authors of the fourth section, and that these expectations have been disappointed in the administration of the law, may be indicated by the following remarks of Hon. John H. Reagan, at that time chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Vol. VII, pp. 7280–7281, July 21, 1886):

"The object of this important provision is to protect the people at noncompetitive points from paying for the carriage of the freight shipped from the competitive points. It was found difficult to provide a rule which would be entirely equitable. It would not be right to charge the same rate per mile for a long as for a short distance, as the loading, unloading, preparation of trains, and handling would be the same in both cases. In adopting the provision that no more shall be charged for the shorter than for the longer distance, which includes the shorter, we did discriminate in favor of the long haul to the extent of providing that no more should be charged for the shorter than for the longer distance, thus leaving the provision so that if the transportation companies find it necessary they may charge as much for the short as for the long haul. This rule recognizes the territorial extent of the country and the character of shipments to be made.

"It enables the transportation companies to carry grain and flour and meats from the productive fields of the West as cheaply as from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia, or from the western part of Pennsylvania or New York to the seaboard.

"'Justice and fair dealing could surely require no more. And in preventing charging more for the short than for the long haul it conforms to the rule adopted in the State constitutions of Pennsylvania, Missouri, Arkansas, and California and by the statute laws of Massachusetts and other States.

"Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois, chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, said in the Senate, April 14, 1886 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Vol. VII, pp. 3472, 3477):

"Section 3 (of 1532 as reported) in general terms prohibits undue discrimination against localities, but section 4 is more specifically directed against that evil, by prohibiting a greater aggregate charge for a shorter than for a longer dstance over the same line, in the same direction, and from the original point of departure. This is the general declaration made, and it is agreed that this is the principle that should be observed as a general rule.

"Senator Cullom then proceeded to argue that there were exceptional cases in which this rule ought not to be absolutely applied. How far the result has been from the expectations and intention of Senator Cullom, who himself was among the most conservative of the framers of the act in regard to this particular regulation, is shown by the fact that the exceptional case which Senator Cullom had in mind has not only taken the place of the general rule, and reversed it, but has in fact become the universal practice, so that the evil of discrimination between communities, which was intended to be cured by this legislation, became more widespread and intense than before.

"The bill, as introduced in the House by Mr. Reagan and as passed by the House, contained no qualifying clause as to "substantially similar circumstances and conditions" and no proviso giving authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant exceptions from its application.

"The fourth section of the Senate bill, as reported by the Senate committee, as will have been noted by the citation from Senator Cullom's remarks above, in addition to this qualifying phrase and proviso, contained, after the word 'direction,' the words 'and from the original point of departure.' In the vote in the Senate on May 5, 1886, these words were stricken out under the leadership of those who favored a stronger long-and-short-haul clause. In conference the words 'the shorter being included within the longer distance' were inserted after the word 'direction' in the place of those which the Senate had stricken out. Those who favored an absolute long-and-short-haul clause supported the House bill in this respect, but in conference a compromise was effected by the insertion of the words just quoted and the retention of the qualifying phrase and proviso mentioned above. It was believed by all that under the fourth section, as so framed, and which was finally enacted into law, the general rule would prohibit the charging of a greater rate for the short than for the long haul, but that in exceptional cases relief from it might be granted.

"Senator Isham G. Harris, of Tennessee, member of the Senate select committee, said, January 11, 1887 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Vol. VII, pp. 527, 530):

"Most of those who oppose this section (as agreed upon in conference) claim that it fixes the same rate per ton per mile for the short as for the long haul. * * * Language could not be selected which would more clearly negative that idea than the language of the section does.

"The plain meaning is that the carrier shall not demand a larger gross sum for hauling a carload of grain or other freight over a part of its line than it demands for hauling a similar carload of the same class of freight over its whole line.

"* * * The proviso of the fourth section confers upon the commission full and complete power whenever application is made to the commission and the commission has become satisfied after investigation that this is an exceptional case under exceptional circumstances which require that the railroad in question should be relieved from the general rule prescribed by the fourth section.

"In the amendment of 1910, eliminating the phrase 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions,' it was obviously intended and expected to strengthen the section and to prevent the discriminations in favor of the long haul which had continued under the act of 1887. There could have been no other purpose in view, and the debates of Congress show that this was the intention. As pointed out above, however, the purpose of Congress was again wholly defeated by reason of the proviso authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant relief in special cases. Under this, as before, the special cases became the universal rule and the situation remained substantially unchanged; and it is evident the only way in which relief from these discriminations can be obtained is by removing the invitation which the section, both in its original form and after the amendment of 1910, contained, to the railroad, to apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for exemptions from the application of the fourth section. The discretion being vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission, the commission upon application felt compelled to exercise the jurisdiction thus conferred upon it. If the discriminations which have wrought so much injustice to the South and West, and, to a lesser extent, to the North and East, are to be removed, it is perfectly evident that this invitation must be withdrawn and this jurisdiction to grant relief from the act must be repealed and the act must be made mandatory and absolute, as provided by this bill.

"The rule should be that the railroads should be allowed to compete with water transportation as far as they can do so without making discriminatory rates between communities. The only interest which the railroads can have in seeking exemption from the fourth section is to destroy the water lines and get their traffic; because, as to mere comparative rates, just as large a revenue can be obtained by such an adjustment of rates to the coast and to interior points as to avoid discrimination.

"The destruction of intercoastal shipping retards the development of an American mercantile marine in the foreign trade, as the two are closely related and interlocked. If a flourishing intercoastal mercantile marine were developed some of its ships would touch at many foreign ports and others would make the intercoastal voyage a part of a continuous voyage between foreign and domestic ports. The handicap which railroads have put upon the development of intercoastal water transportation has been one of the most potent and deterrent factors preventing the development of American shipping in the foreign trade.

"If the ship lines could not meet railroad competition, would it be claimed that the interior should be taxed to subsidize them in order to enable them to do so? Regardless of the merits of the general proposition of a ship subsidy, certainly the proposition that this subsidy should be paid by only certain portions of the country, while others should be relieved from it, would not be considered for a moment; and yet this, to all intents and purposes, is the privilege which the railroads claim to enable them to meet water competition.

"By driving away water transportation, not only are the Pacific ports deprived of its benefits, but the interior as well, since such points as Spokane would be enabled to get the benefit of the water rate plus the local rate to Spokane. It is assumed by some representatives of the railways that the ship lines, if allowed to engage in this business, would get practically all of the coast traffic. This is manifestly not the case, since it was testified by railroad officials themselves in the hearing that much of traffic would move by rail regardless of the water lines and, as has been recently demonstrated, the railroads would receive as much business as they can efficiently handle, notwithstanding water competition, and the people would be willing to pay for it reasonable rates so long as they were uniform to all and unjust discrimination was abolished.

"When freight rates were last year arbitrarily increased 25 per cent the discrimination against the interior was greatly intensified. While the interior was already suffering from the unjust burden of higher rates for shorter hauls the flat increase of 25 per cent on all rates in the section covered by the increase resulted in a larger absolute increase for the intermediate points than the same percentage produced when applied to the lower rates at the favored long-haul points. To still further widen the breach and aggravate the inequality of burden the percentage war tax on all freight bills was, of course, much larger on the higher freight bills of the interior points than upon the lower bills of the favored localities. In this way the original injustice was made the basis for a series of still further injustice and burdensome discriminations. As said by Mr. A. J. McGehee, secretary of the Association of Commerce of Jackson, Tenn., in the Traffic World, January 4, 1919:

"The recent raise in freight rates of 25 per cent on the dollar resulted in a very much greater increase of the high rates to the interior than it did the low rate to the river points; for illustration: Supposing the rate to the river point to be 50 cents per hundred, the increase made it 62½ cents per hundred, and the rate to the interior point, already, without any reasonable excuse, being $1 per hundred, is now $1.25 per hundred. * * *

"It is taxation without representation, because there has not been, and is not now, one single person who has authority or a vote in the matter of fixing these rates who lives in and has his personal fortune invested in any of these interior points. * * * It is taxation without recompense, because there is no possible return nor compensation given by the railroads, to the people of the interior, resulting from the levying of this excess tax."

"As indicating in total results the enormous surtax laid upon the people of localities against which this discrimination is practiced Mr. J. B. Campbell, of Spokane, Wash., a thoroughly well-informed and responsible witness, who, as the representative of the Spokane Merchants' Association, has studied the situation for years, in the hearings upon this bill, page 136, said:

"The average excess of transportation tax paid by the intermountain territory per year is $11,997,248. That is $998,104 per month, or $33,270 per day. The average excess war tax that will have to be paid by the intermountain territory upon a similar amount of traffic would amount, per year—if it ran a year—to $359,917.44, or $29,993.12 per month, or $99.77 per day. Now, excess war tax. Just think of that for a moment."

"In the hearings, page 135, Mr. Campbell testified that the annual intermountain freight tonnage hauled by the railroads, tonnage on which were paid excess freight rates, amounted to 2,994,312 tons. This estimate he arrived at by taking actual figures for four months of 1916 as supplied by the railroads. Mr. Campbell testified that this intermountain tonnage paid an average excess over the coast rates of 20 cents a hundred or $4 a ton, making an annual total of $11,997,248 excess freight rates paid by the intermountain country.

"One of the most illuminating and rather astonishing features of the discriminatory rate system, whereby the long haul or end-of-the-line points are given less than reasonable rates, based merely on the so-called out-of-pocket cost, because it is argued there is water competition at those points, is that in a shipment, for instance, from New York, which passes over several connecting lines, making a joint charge for the transportation, those lines which reach New York, the seaport, receive exactly the same rate whether the shipment is consigned to, we will say, Seattle, the terminal point, or Spokane, the interior point; and the enormous surplus which is paid upon a shipment to Spokane, as against a shipment to Seattle, is wholly received by the lines west of St. Paul. In other words, while the discrimination is based on the argument or assumption of water competition, the increased rate charged for the shorter haul is wholly collected and absorbed by a line which has no water competition whatever between its eastern terminal at St. Paul and its western terminal at Seattle, which shows that the excuse given for the discrimination is altogether fictitious. Mr. Percy P. Powell, a prominent wholesale merchant doing business at Spokane, Wash., in his testimony before the joint committee of Congress, which is reprinted at page 82 of the hearings on this bill, said:

"The rate on canned goods from New York to Spokane is $1.10 per hundred and the minimum is 60,000 pounds. The revenue on a car of canned goods from New York to Spokane on that minimum is $660, whereas the rate to the Pacific coast, which is 85 cents a hundred with the same minimum, produces a revenue of $510, the rate to Spokane earning $150 more than the rate to the Pacific coast. The carriers earn $150 more by dropping that commodity at a point 342 miles closer than the Pacific coast point of destination. This revenue is divided as follows: The lines east of St. Paul on the Pacific coast traffic receive $180.38, and the lines west of St. Paul receive $329.62. On the Spokane traffic the lines east of St. Paul receive $180.38, which is identically the same amount they receive if the car goes through to Seattle or the Pacific coast terminals, and the lines west of St. Paul on that same traffic receive $479.62. Now, whether this car of canned goods is subject to water competition or not, the eastern lines, or the eastern carriers, deliver that car from New York to St. Paul at exactly the same rate. * * * The excess freight we pay on those goods is paid the western line that hauls the car from St. Paul to Spokane, and Commissioner Prouty, and in fact all the orders of the commission, have stated absolutely that water competition does not exist between St. Paul and Spokane.

"Industries will not be developed at interior points on the basis of temporary rates. Neither will boat lines be established so long as the old system is liable to be restored at any time by which the railroads would be allowed to make rates at terminal points which would kill off water transportation. Rate uniformity must be put upon a permanent basis, as would be the case if S. 313 should be enacted into law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was just going to say that while I hope that the consideration of the amendment may not be delayed, I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over, so far as the vote is concerned, until to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rose to say that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who, as the Senator from Washington will remember, presented the amendment to the present law which is found in the bill now before the Senate, desires an opportunity to be heard a moment upon that phase of the subject, and I have sent for him, and he will be here at once.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, there is still another Senator who I understand wishes to be heard on the amendment, who is not in the city to-day, but who expects to be here to-morrow, I believe. If the Senator from Washington will consent that the vote shall be taken on this amendment to-morrow it will greatly accommodate that Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I asked that the amendment be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. MOSES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand that he had asked that it be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Washington consents to passing over until to-morrow the amendment which he has proposed, I hope he will withdraw it, so that other amendments may be offered and we can go forward with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington has asked unanimous consent, the Chair understands, that the vote on his amendment be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes, that was my request. I do not think it is necessary to withdraw it, if by unanimous consent it is passed over. We frequently do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that that can be done so as not to interfere with the offering of other amendments and going on with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands it. If there is no objection, such will be the order.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In the first print of the bill, on page 66, after line 21, insert:

SEC. 31½. The provisions of this act relating to the grouping, consolidation, or Federal incorporation of carriers by rail, the adjustment of rates, fares, and charges in rate districts to yield the returns prescribed herein, and the disposition of the excess railway operating income of carriers by rail shall not be construed to apply to or affect any belt line railroad, terminal switching railroad, or other terminal facility, owned exclusively and maintained, operated, and controlled by any State or political subdivision thereof.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I view the bill, I think the substance of the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Louisiana is already in the bill, in even a broader form than is contained in the amendment. I have no objection whatever to it, so far as I can assent to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. GAY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to say that the Senator from Iowa has made in regard to five or six other amendments the same statement just made in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, and really I can not see why we should adopt amendments that are already covered by provisions of the bill. It seems to me it is simply lumbering the bill, with no good whatever coming from it.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, this matter was discussed rather exhaustively last night, and as there seemed to be some difference of opinion as to the possible interpretation of the amendment presented on yesterday, I have had this amendment drawn which I now offer as a substitute. The object of the amendment is to exempt public-owned belt railroads, belt railroads which are exclusively within the confines of a State, similar to the one owned by the city of New Orleans, from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; I have no objection. I suppose all such questions will be thrashed out in conference.

Mr. GAY. I was going to suggest that, if the amendment could be adopted, I would not care to take up the time of the Senate at this time with any lengthy discussion. The amendment was gone into in some detail last evening; but if it is desired that I should go into a discussion of it, I am prepared to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana, as I was not here last night, just a little about the effect of the amendment. Does it exempt State-owned roads from the operation of the bill, and to what extent?

Mr. GAY. It exempts belt-line railroads and terminal switching railroads owned by any State or political subdivision thereof. The Senator from Georgia is now referring to the amendment which I first offered. I have withdrawn that amendment, and this is a substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I would like to hear the substitute stated. I have read the other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand the amendment applies only to belt lines?

Mr. CUMMINS. Belt lines, switching facilities, switching tracks, and the like.

The bill does not propose to control belt lines, switching facilities, plant facilities, and other transportation instrumentalities of that kind, nor does it propose to take from such facilities their earnings or regulate their earnings in any way whatever, as I understand the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My interest is not in the belt lines. The State that I have the honor to represent owns a main line from Atlanta to Chattanooga, which is the most valuable property owned by the State. It was leased out for a term of years by the State, and it was to see the effect upon that line that I was especially looking at the amendment. It does not touch it, and therefore I have no suggestion to make. I may conclude, however, that a further amendment to take care of the line to which I refer will be necessary.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to interfere, but I prefer the original amendment. Of course, if the Senator changes it to suit the New Orleans situation I shall not object, but I should be glad to support an amendment like that originally offered, which takes care of a State's property.

Mr. GAY. That amendment was withdrawn, and therefore this is the only amendment that is before the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] a moment ago referred to the general provision in the bill. That proviso is to be found on page 22, as I recall it, and reads as follows:

Provided further, That terminals, belt-line railways, tap lines, and other short lines or lines owned and operated by distinct corporations and so peculiarly situated or in such financial condition as to be practically incapable of consolidation, may be excluded if, in the judgment of the board, it is for the public interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 21 a new section, to read as follows:

For the purpose of enabling carriers by railroad subject to the commerce act properly to serve the public during the transition period immediately following the termination of Federal control, any such carrier may, at any time after the passage of this act and before the expiration of two years after the termination of Federal control, make application to the transportation board hereinafter created for a loan from the United States, setting forth the amount of the loan and the term for which it is desired, the purpose of the loan and the uses to which it will be applied, the present prospective ability of the applicant to repay the loan and meet the requirements of its obligations in that regard, the character and value of the security offered, and the extent to which the public convenience and necessity will be served. The application shall be accompanied by statements showing such facts and details as the board may require with respect to the physical situation, ownership, capitalization, indebtedness, contract obligations, operation, and earning power of the applicant, together with such other facts relating to the propriety and expediency of granting the loan applied for and the ability of the applicant to make good the obligation as the board may deem pertinent to the inquiry.

(b) If the board, after such hearing and investigation, with or without notice, as it may direct, finds that the making, in whole or in part, of the proposed loan by the United States is necessary to enable the applicant properly to meet the transportation needs of the people, and that the prospective earning power of the applicant and the character and value of the security offered are such as to furnish reasonable assurance of the applicant's ability to repay the loan within the time fixed therefor, the board may certify to the Secretary of the Treasury its findings of fact and its recommendations as to the amount of the loan which is to be made; the time, not exceeding five years from the making thereof, within which it is to be repaid; the character of the security which is to be offered therefor; and the terms and conditions of the loan.

(c) Upon receipt of such certificate from the board, the Secretary of the Treasury, at any time before the expiration of 26 months after the termination of Federal control, is authorized to make a loan, not exceeding the maximum amount recommended in such certificate, out of any moneys in the revolving fund provided for in this section. All such loans shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to be placed to the credit of the revolving fund provided for in this section. The time, not exceeding five years from the making thereof, within which such loan is to be repaid, the security which is to be taken therefor, which shall be adequate to secure the loan, the terms and conditions of the loan, and the form of the obligation to be entered into, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

(d) Loans so made shall be preferred liens upon the income and property of the applicant in the same manner and to the same extent that certificates issued by receivers appointed by United States courts are preferred liens upon the income and property that is being administered by the receiver.

(e) The board or the Secretary of the Treasury may call upon the Federal Reserve Board for advice and assistance with respect to any such applications or loans.

(f) There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $750,000,000, which shall be used as a revolving fund for the purpose of making the loans provided for in this section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the amendment as written is identical with section 208 of H. R. 10453, the bill passed by the House and now on the Senate calendar with notice of a motion to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute S. 3288 as it shall be amended, except that the phraseology is brought into harmony with S. 3288 by substituting the words "transportation board" or "board" for "commission," and the substitution of $750,000,000 for $250,000,000 as a revolving fund.

The creation of such fund was not urged upon the Senate committee by anyone until a few days ago, when a situation presented itself in the market for investment funds.

The Senate committee has not considered the amendment, but I believe it is so important to the country to properly finance the roads after they are turned back that the conference committee should at least consider the maximum amount needed to meet the financial requirements of the roads which are turned back in my opinion not in as good condition as when they were taken over.

It had been assumed that upon the return of the roads under proper safeguards for their financial welfare they would be able to borrow capital from the investing public. It now is learned that a committee of bankers advising in respect to the proposed general equipment trust to take care of cars and locomotives purchased by the Director General has advised that market conditions are not favorable now to the placing of even that gilt-edge security, and as the obstacle is, therefore, a question of credit supply, the apprehension is expressed that less attractive securities offered by the railroads during the coming year may be no more successful.

The vital public interest in adequacy of facilities and service in the immediate future seems to require that in the absence of a public market for railroad securities Congress should provide a credit with which the roads can proceed with essential work. The House bill provides $250,000,000 for this purpose. The Senate bill contains no such provision. Under conference rules if the Senate shall not act on this aspect before sending its bill to conference, the conferees would be limited to considering sums between $250,000,000 and nothing. In view of the prospect of early passage of the Senate bill and the lack of opportunity thus far since investment conditions became clear for deliberate study of the situation, this amendment is introduced, putting the figure at $750,000,000 in order that the conferees may, under the rules, consider any figure which may later be deemed wise between $750,000,000 and $250,000,000. To authorize such a revolving fund does not mean that the total sum ever will be loaned. What is now proposed is to place the conferees in position to use their judgment in the light of information which may become available.

The sum of $750,000,000 is the figure suggested in conversation by Director General Hines. He does not expect that the carriers will be able actually to expend in that time more than five or six hundred millions, but thinks it will be necessary for them to make commitments in addition to these sums so as to provide for continuity of work.

In the event that there should be protracted delay in placing railroad loans with the investing public, there will be a number of fixed commitments to meet. The chairman of the House committee, Mr. ESCH, in his report to the House on H. R. 10453, pages 38 to 41, sets forth the amount of securities now outstanding which will mature in 1920 and require new capital for their discharge. This item is $221,234,692. During 1920, also, will come due one-fifteenth of the sums to be paid on the rolling stock already purchased by the Railroad Administration, or about $25,000,000. Improvements other than rolling stock already contracted for are estimated by Mr. Powell, Director of Capital Expenditures of the Railroad Administration, at from two hundred to two hundred and fifty millions of new money. This is a total of $446,234,692. If total dependence for new capital had to be placed upon the revolving fund of $750,000,000 this would leave $303,765,318. The Director General spent for additions and betterments in the last year for which statistics are available, 1918, about $576,000,000. The average for 10 years, as shown by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, was about $579,000,000. Deducting from the 1918 figure the $200,000,000, which was Director Powell's minimum estimate for additions and betterments already contracted for and now under construction, not including any rolling stock, this would leave about $379,000,000 of capital improvements not provided for. It is generally known that the year 1919 has been a period of heavy deferred improvements on account of the near approach of a return to corporate operation.

It, therefore, seems obvious that an insurance of $750,000,000 of loans would be moderate in case investment conditions should continue for any length of time as they now are, and the public is to be served with facility. At least it appears prudent for the Senate to permit the conferees the latitude suggested.

Mr. President, I called Mr. Hines on the telephone and asked him in regard to the capital requirements of the railroads for the present year, and I now ask the Secretary to read his written reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, December 11, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FRELINGHUYSEN: Yesterday afternoon you telephoned me to get my estimate as to the capital expenditures which ought to be provided for the railroads for the calendar year 1920.

This morning I have again gone over this question with the Director of our Division of Capital Expenditures, and as a result express the following as my judgment:

Your inquiry presupposes that the capital expenditures would be planned and carried out by the railroad companies. On that assumption it must be borne in mind that the companies will require time to formulate and adopt plans and arrange for financing. This will all require considerable time, and it is not probable that the companies would be able to enter in a confident and effective way upon the making of provision for either betterments to roadway or acquisition of additional rolling stock upon an extensive scale prior to March 1 next. The amount that they would be able to spend in the calendar year 1920 would be considerably curtailed by such a late start in putting their plans into effect. Taking this into consideration, my judgment is that $400,000,000 would represent approximately the expenditure of cash which they would actually be able to make in the remaining part of the calendar year 1920. There is a possibility that this might be somewhat exceeded, but I do not think, in any event, it would go beyond $500,000,000, and I think the probability is much more in favor of $400,000,000.

I do not mean by the foregoing that the figure of $400,000,000 represents the full amount that ought in the public interest to be expended during the year 1920. On the contrary, I should say that at least 50 per cent additional ought to be expended in order reasonably to provide for the needs of the public service; but, in my opinion, this larger and more desirable provision can not be made because of the delay which will inevitably be connected with the transition back to private control and with each company thereafter making its own independent plans and necessarily waiting until it can obtain some more definite light as to its financial status.

Sincerely, yours,

WALKER D. HINES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think possibly my view on this question is one that may not accord with that of other Senators. I look upon it as good business for the United States Government at this time, when the credit of the transportation system of the country is at its lowest ebb, when the underlying securities are selling at figures which have not been reached before in 20 years, and when it will be almost impossible for the railroad companies to borrow sufficient funds to rehabilitate themselves when they go back into private management, to enact such legislation as is proposed in the amendment. I have but one interest in the matter, and that is to see that this transportation system, which, when it was turned over to the Federal Government was the best system of railways on the face of the globe, is properly rehabilitated.

The United States Government has been in control of the railroads for over a year and a half.

The railroads have had to stand the burden and pressure of war. They are returned to their owners at a time when their credit, as I have said, is at the lowest ebb. No one can estimate the amount of damage caused by their usage during the period while they have been under Government control. It is estimated at 10 per cent, and in some quarters as high as 20 per cent. That would run into several billion dollars; but even so, we know that the rolling stock of the roads was never in such poor condition as at present; we know that there are improvements which have to be made; and if the transportation system is to be immediately restored the roads must have money in order that they may be put into efficient condition.

In addition to that, there are maturing railroad obligations expiring in 1920 which will have to be refunded. I feel that when the roads have served the Government and in fact the world so well, and through their use we have been enabled to win the war, when they are returned to their owners the Government can do no better than to give them sufficient credit in order that they may make the necessary improvements immediately and restore the efficiency of the transportation system.

Therefore, with the idea in view that the country's best interest will thereby be served, I have offered this amendment, in order that the conference committee may consult with Director General Hines and ascertain the sum needed for the rehabilitation of the roads and that the United States Government may further sustain the roads by loaning the necessary funds for such rehabilitation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the subject of the amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from New Jersey was not presented to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I know nothing with regard to the views of the members of the committee upon it. It is impossible, however, for me to allow the amendment to be submitted to a vote without expressing my opinion with regard to it.

The House of Representatives has proposed to appropriate in the bill $250,000,000 as a revolving fund, to be used in making loans to railroad companies after their properties shall have been returned. I have hoped, Mr. President, that Congress would adopt such legislation, fair to the railroads and fair to the public, as would enable the railroads to command the credit necessary to meet the exigencies of the coming year.

I am not willing to assume that the railroads can not, under the legislation which shall finally be adopted, borrow the money which they unquestionably will need. I do not doubt the statement of the Senator from New Jersey that the railroads will need during the coming year for additions, betterments, and other expenditures that are chargeable to capital account, together with the maturities of their funded obligations, quite $750,000,000. There can be no real question with regard to their requirements in that respect.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very much interested in the statement the Senator is making. As I was able to follow the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey, it was to the effect that the Director General of Railroads was of the opinion that $400,000,000 would be required, or, at the outside, not to exceed $500,000,000, and that, in his judgment, $400,000,000 would be more nearly correct. That being so, why should we provide $750,000,000 for the purpose indicated?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not suggesting that we provide for $750,000,000, If the Senator will wait for just a moment I will give him my view upon that.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said a few days ago, and I have no doubt about the accuracy of the statement, that there ought to be expended upon the railways of the United States not less than $750,000,000 during the coming year. The Director General states in his communication that in his judgment not more than $400,000,000, in view of the lateness of the season, can be well or properly expended for these purposes; and to that we must add, of course, $140,000,000 or $150,000,000 of obligations which will mature during the year; but, as I remarked a few moments ago, it seems to me that Congress ought to assume that the legislation which is to be adopted will enable the railroad companies to borrow what money is needed for these purposes. So I have not been able, and I am not now able, to give my concurrence to the proposal that there be $750,000,000 appropriated to be loaned to the railroad companies during the coming year. To me that is a confession that private management and operation are substantially impossible.

I can see no reason in the situation for believing that the railroad companies can not, upon good security, borrow money just as readily, though not, possibly, at as low a rate of interest, during the coming year as they can borrow money during the year following the coming year or any other year in the future. If I did not believe that the legislation which will be adopted by Congress would put the transportation system of the United States in position to take care of itself and be susceptible of private management and private operation I would not be in favor of returning the railroads to their present owners. If the future shall develop or shall show that we are mistaken in that respect and that the railroad companies can not borrow the money which is necessary for adequate facilities and for adequate service, that will be the time, it seems to me, for them to come to Congress for the loan which is contemplated in the amendment.

To me the suggestion implies great doubt of the efficacy of the legislation which we are proposing, and inasmuch as I do not maintain a doubt of that character I can not support the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

It may be true that the railroads are not in as good condition as they were when they were taken over by the Government. That is a matter of dispute, and I do not pretend to have the facts necessary to enable me to form an opinion upon the subject with respect to the railroads as a whole. I know the situation with regard to some of the railroads; but even if the condition stated by the Senator from New Jersey exists, it seems to me that it is fully met by the obligation on the part of the Government to return these properties to their owners in as good condition as when they were taken on the 1st of January, 1918. The Government of the United States must pay for any difference in condition, if that condition be adverse to the Government, and so far as an appropriation being necessary to meet that obligation is concerned, I shall be in favor of it the moment the condition appears and the moment the fact is shown, for I hope the Government never will be careless or indifferent or even slow in responding to any obligation into which it has entered, but I can not see that that consideration can support the appropriation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to ask a question of the Senator, the Senator from New Jersey has suggested that one reason why he was offering this amendment at this time was to take care of the parliamentary situation. Now, of course, I shall hope that the Senate bill shall be finally enacted, but it is the present plan of the chairman of the committee, as I understand, ultimately to move to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill. Is the Senator of the opinion that when this matter is thrown into conference, if it should be thrown into conference, it will be necessary to have in the bill some such provision as is contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey in order that it can be made a proper subject of conference as to the amount?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Ohio has not caught the exact point made by the Senator from New Jersey. If the Senate bill is substituted for the House bill, as I hope and expect it will be, and then a conference occurs, there will be in conference the propriety of appropriating $250,000,000 for the purposes indicated in the amendment. But the Senator from New Jersey thinks that there ought to be a larger sum in controversy, so that the conference committee could agree upon an appropriation of $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 or $750,000,000, whereas at the present time and under the present prospective procedure the conference committee would be limited to an appropriation of $250,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. That is just the question I had in my own mind. I am not sufficiently familiar with the conference rules to be able to determine now as to whether or not we would be limited to the $250,000,000 in the event that there was nothing of this kind in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey were adopted I assume that the conference would be limited only by the extreme—that is, the $750,000,000—but if the amendment is not adopted, then the conference committee would be limited to making an appropriation of $250,000,000, which is the sum named in the House bill.

Mr. POMERENE. That is what I wanted to be reassured about.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator well knows that I have no intention of opposing his views in regard to this measure. I know the study he has given to this subject, and I only felt that it would be wise for the Senate to enact this provision, in the event of the conference committee finding that not only the $250,000,000 but more is necessary, so that they might have the opportunity of increasing that figure, and that the conference would not be practically foreclosed to a limit of $250,000,000. Now, I am informed, and I believe credibly, that when the $250,000,000 figure was reached in the House bill that was an estimate which they had procured for the needs of the roads next year, and that after it was enacted it was ascertained that probably the capital need would be much more. The Senate bill makes no provision for the creation of a revolving fund to take care of the credit needs of the railroads. I introduced that, and it is in my amendment, because very early, when we were considering this measure, the railroad men, the executives themselves and those interested in this problem, said that the railroads would have extreme difficulty in procuring their capital needs next year. Therefore, I simply introduced this amendment in order that the chairman of the committee, who has labored so zealously in order to solve this great problem, might not be restricted should he find himself face to face with a financial problem that possibly he himself, although at the present time opposed, might in the conference committee feel it necessary to solve.

If the Senator opposes it, of course I know that the amendment will not be adopted; but I hope, in order that there may be no limitation upon the deliberations of the conference committee, that this maximum amount may go into this bill, so that the Senator may be free either to limit it to $250,000,000 or increase it if he believes it wise, or cut it out altogether.

Therefore, believing that the most important question at this time is the credit of the railway system of the country, I have offered this amendment so that the conference committee will not be confined to the limitations of the House bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. In view of the parliamentary situation, and in view of the opinion which has been given by the Director General of Railroads, it does seem to me that the Senator ought to limit the amount of loans authorized to four or five hundred millions. I am disposed to agree with the chairman of the committee that it probably would be better to take up this subject when the situation requires it; but at the same time, as this matter may be thrown into conference, why should the Senate place a figure beyond that which the Director General says could be used by the railroads? I suggest a limitation of it to $400,000,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator will place it at $500,000,000, which is the outside figure suggested by the Director General, I should be very glad to have it changed.

Mr. POMERENE. It is the Senator's amendment. I leave that matter to his judgment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Well, I will make it five hundred millions. I will modify the amendment by changing it to five hundred millions.

I ask, Mr. President, that the amendment may be printed and go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. STANLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Elkins	Harrison	La Follette
Bankhead	Fall	Henderson	Lenroot
Brandegee	Fernald	Hitchcock	McKellar
Calder	Fletcher	Johnson, S. Dak.	McLean
Capper	France	Jones, N. Mex.	McNary
Colt	Frelinghuysen	Jones, Wash.	Moses
Cummins	Gay	Kendrick	Myers
Curtis	Gerry	Keyes	Nelson
Dial	Gore	King	New
Dillingham	Hale	Kirby	Newberry

Poindexter	Smith, Md.	Thomas	Watson
Pomerene	Smith, S. C.	Trammell	Wolcott

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Monday, December 15, 1919.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the proposed amendment contemplates the elimination of all provisions in the act providing for compulsory arbitration, including the various boards of wages and working conditions and the provisions providing for certain pains and penalties in the event of a strike after the finding of the board of transportation.

The attitude of Members of the Senate toward any legislation designed to prevent or punish striking will depend in great measure upon their varied conceptions of the meaning of the term. Webster defines a strike as "the act of quitting work, especially such an act by a body of workmen done as a means of enforcing compliance with demands made on their employers." He also defines "strike" as "an extortion of money or the attempt to extort money by the threat of injury."

Now, jurists have differed as widely in their conception of what this thing that we call a strike is as the lexicographers. If a strike is blackmail, if a strike is an attempt by illegal means to extort money, the quicker legislation is enacted to prevent it the better.

If it implies simply the refusal of one or more men to continue service in the employ of a private corporation or individual, its punishment is an entirely different matter.

The distinction between legal and illegal acts, between things which the law should not punish, which would imply the deprivation of an inherent right, an inalienable right, and the punishment of things that are palpably illegal and wrong has been clearly drawn in a decision, Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed. Rept., 310), to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has already called the attention of the Senate.

Before inflicting heavy pains and penalties, we should know exactly what we are prohibiting and what we are penalizing. In the Oakes case the receivers for the railroad asked for an injunction. They alleged that irreparable injury was about to be inflicted and prayed that the employees of the carrier be restrained from committing depredations upon the property of the carrier, or from conspiring together to prevent the operation of the road, or from quitting the service of the carrier in a body with the intention to embarass such operation, or to hinder or delay the movement of commerce.

That great, wise, level-headed jurist, who combined in a strange and a rare degree a wealth of head and heart, that superb and robust intellect, John M. Harlan, draws the distinction between the right of employees to desist, to abstain individually or collectively from the employment of the master, and the license—because it could not be a right—to prevent another from entering its employ or from inflicting injury of any character whatever upon the property of the employer. Was not that the distinction that was drawn?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it was.

Mr. STANLEY. He modified the injunction by eliminating any prohibition upon the part of the court against the quitting by employees individually or collectively and retained in the order the prohibition against any injury to property or any effort to interfere with those who chose to enter the employment of the carrier.

Said Justice Harlan in that case:

> It would be an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for or to remain in the personal service of another.

Now, remember, the Government has a right to command my service nolens volens. I am of the opinion that a soldier in the service of his country or a policeman protecting the safety of a city has no right to strike. The proudest and most self-respecting citizen can render such service to the Government under conditions which render a breach of his contract a form of desertion. But you can not invest in any private citizen or corporation whatever that power which free and self-respecting men willingly render to the State. That is a sovereign power.

Said Mr. Justice Harlan:

> One who is placed under such constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude, a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States or in any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Now, as to their right to do collectively that which he says you could not prohibit them from doing singly, Justice Harlan said:

> We have said that if employees were unwilling to remain in the service of the receivers for the compensation prescribed for them by the revised schedules, it was the right of each one on that account to withdraw from such service. It was equally their right without reference to the effect upon the property or upon the operation of the road to confer with each other upon the subject of the proposed reduction in wages and withdraw in a body from the service of the receivers because of the proposed change. Indeed, their right as a body of employees affected by the proposed reduction of wages to demand given rates of compensation as a condition of their remaining in the service was as absolute and perfect as was the right of the receivers representing the aggregation of persons, creditors, and stockholders interested in the trust property.

Now, let us see if the bill is designed to prohibit the positive, affirmative interference with interstate commerce. I concur with the committee that if we have not sufficient law to protect common carriers and to permit the unimpeded course of commerce, it should be passed. But there is a vast difference between such interference and sending an officer of the law into the home of an employee and commanding him to return to the service of his master or go to jail. In this very case the judge of the lower court who issued the injunction considered a strike—

> Essentially a conspiracy to extort by violence; the means employed to effect the end being not only the cessation of labor by the conspirators but by the necessary prevention of labor by those who are willing to assume their places—

Is that the strike about which we are talking? Justice Hannen, in Farer against Close, an early English decision, declares:

> A strike is properly defined as a simultaneous cessation of work on the part of workmen, and its legality or illegality must depend upon the means by which it is enforced and on its objects.

Justice Harlan, in the same case to which I have referred, said a strike may be—> the orderly withdrawal of a large number or in a body from the service of their employers on account simply of a reduction in their wages. Such a withdrawal is not either illegal or criminal.

Is this the thing which this proposed law is designed to prohibit? The more conservative railroad presidents of this country believe that if this bill is passed it will precipitate a strike. I have no doubt of it.

Are you going to say to 2,000,000 proud and intelligent employees of the carriers, "If you meet in your lodge rooms or in your locals or anywhere else and discuss working conditions, if you find these conditions onerous or the compensation inadequate and agree to seek better and more remunerative employment elsewhere, and as a result of such conference two or more of you quit the service of the master, you shall be forthwith imprisoned"? That is exactly what it means.

The antistrike provision of this proposed act does not design to prevent lawlessness, or the clubbing of nonunion labor, the blowing up of bridges, the demolition of cars, or the wrecking of engines. Why? Because the chairman of the committee in presenting this bill to the Senate says that was not the purpose.

Mr. KING. Would it disturb the Senator if I should interrupt him?

Mr. STANLEY. Not in the slightest. I shall be glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. KING. The policy of the Government since 1887 has been to assert control over common carriers. They are to be treated as essential to the life and the welfare and the happiness of the people of our country. Indeed, they are essential to the life, the welfare, and happiness of the people.

Mr. STANLEY. They are absolutely so.

Mr. KING. By common consent it has been agreed that the Federal Government shall take charge of these instrumentalities of commerce. This bill, however, goes further than preceding bills.

Mr. STANLEY. It goes further than any bill which has ever been passed on the subject.

Mr. KING. It aims to provide for wages, for just compensation; it fixes the rates which the carriers may charge; it provides boards and instrumentalities to curb and control and determine the activities of the railroads. Why? Because the railroads are essential to the welfare of the public. The Government says, "You must operate these roads in a certain way; you must operate them continuously."

The Government having taken the employers and their property under its charge and jurisdiction and subjected them to limitations, without expressing any opinion, I desire to ask, Is there anything improper in the Government going further and, in the aid of the people everywhere, in the aid of continuity of service, for the welfare and for the life of the people, saying to the employees, "We think that you should be impressed more or less with this public interest, this public duty; that you ought not to strike; that you ought not to conspire to interfere with transportation and with the service which is necessary for the life and welfare of the people?" That seems to be the theory of the bill; that if the Government, for the good of the public, can take charge of the property and of the individuals who own the property, the employees who are connected with these roads ought to submit to what this bill conceives to be, I presume, reasonable rules and regulations, to the end that the public interest may not suffer and the health and the happiness of the people be materially affected. Does the Senator think that the principle which would apply to private corporations in their relations with their employees should apply to public corporations, or, in view of the Government taking charge of the railroads and their property and fixing the rates, and so on, whether or not it has authority to deal with the employees? I express no opinion. I am inclined to think that the argument which the Senator from Kentucky is making, however, is very sound.

Mr. STANLEY. I will answer the Senator by saying yes and no. Commerce is to the industrial body what the circulation of the blood is to the physical body. Any interference with the movement of traffic has the same effect upon our industrial life as strangulation has upon our physical existence. The stoppage of the movement of traffic is more than a loss to the private corporation maintaining the road; it is a positive injury to the public; that is all true. Congress has a right to protect the public, and should do so by inflicting the most drastic pains and penalties upon any man or any set of men who attempt by any overt act to stop the movement of the mails or of passengers or freight or to offer any character of physical injury to the appliances used in interstate commerce. Congress has the right to enact—and should enact—the most drastic legislation punishing the engineer who leaves his locomotive, the conductor who quits his coach, the brakeman who leaves his car and then attempts by intimidation or physical violence or any other act to prevent another from taking his place; but I do not conceive that the public—that a majority—have any rights that the minority have not.

The right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is common to all, and the right, whether a man works with his head or with his hands, high or low, to seek individually or collectively that employment which is the most congenial and most profitable, is essential to the life, liberty, and happiness of a proud man. The majority, namely, the public, may, perchance, be inconvenienced by a carrier's lack of labor, by difficulties in the movement of traffic, not because its employees have done anything to hinder the operation of trains, but simply because their personal presence is needed to move them; under such circumstances the public is not warranted in saying: "If you do not work for a wage and under conditions named by some governmental board you must go to jail." That is not tolerable in a free country; that is establishing a system of involuntary servitude for the public good; and a system of involuntary servitude in one business will spread into another. A wise reformer once stated that they who deny liberty to others shall not long enjoy it themselves. Such a pernicious principle once established among common carriers will soon spread to mines, mills, and factories.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very much interested in this discussion and must admit that it impresses me very forcefully; but I have been thinking of this situation: Take the coal strike; the mining of coal can only be carried on by those who have been especially trained or educated along that particular line. Now, if all of the coal miners concluded to quit mining coal at once, and there were no other supply of labor to take the place of those who are quitting, can the Senator suggest any remedy, in view of the premise which he is laying down, to relieve the public of absolute suffering and misery?

Mr. STANLEY. May I borrow a Yankee habit and answer that question of the Senator by asking him one?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be delighted to answer if I can.

Mr. STANLEY. No misfortune can be so great as positive famine. The people of this country would starve to death if the sower did not sow the seed; if the farmer did not raise cattle and hogs. That work requires technical skill; a man can not plow until he learns the business; a man can not be a farmer without considerable intelligence; and I think it takes about the most intelligent men in this country to do it successfully. Suppose the men who tilled the fields found that they could make more money operating the railroads or working in the mines and they should all quit plowing corn and raising hogs, would the Senator be in favor of an act that would send men to jail who did not stay on the farm?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not saying that I am in favor of the provision in the bill putting people in jail for striking on the railroads; I have not come to that conclusion as yet; but I was just wondering what remedy, if any, could be provided by law.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to say to the Senator—and I say it respectfully, because it is a hypothetical case—that he is shooting at a bogey man, a man of straw. It is absolutely futile, it is, I should say, an unfounded fear, an impossible thing that he is proposing to guard against for this reason: We had just as well pass an act in Congress punishing men for pulling their own teeth as to pass acts designed to prevent millions of men from starving or freezing themselves to death. It is impossible for all the miners of this country to stay out of the mines and everybody else stay out of the mines until the miners with the rest of us freeze to death. That is never going to happen; and it never can happen. It is just as improbable as that all the farmers of this country will ever refuse to sow wheat and to plow corn and to raise cattle until famine stalks in the streets and until they and their children die of hunger. It is impossible that 2,000,000 trainmen, with 10,000,000 dependent upon them, will ever abandon the highways until traffic rots in the ports, until trade is stagnant, and until ruin and bankruptcy and starvation desolate the land. Those things can not happen. They never have happened. They never will happen. The pain of the thing will drive the conductor back to his car, the engineer back to his engine. The force of public opinion, the inevitable suffering that they and their wives and children will be subjected to, will adjust the matter as it always has and it always will. You are providing the most dangerous, the most drastic, the most exasperating legislation to prevent a thing that is just as probable as that a meteor will strike the earth.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I made the inquiry and used the illustration which I gave owing to the condition which seems to have confronted the country just recently; and I believe the Senator will agree that unless that coal strike had been settled there would have been great suffering and loss of life in this country.

Mr. STANLEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, there was great suffering, and in some places there was, as I am advised, loss of life because of the inadequacy of fuel.

Mr. STANLEY. That is true.

Mr. KING. And I do not think the suffering of some of those people in the extreme West influenced the miners in going back to work, either.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Referring to this coal strike, which is very recent history, are we not justified in gathering this lesson from that strike?

Before I deduce my conclusion from the facts, let me preface my statement by calling attention to the fact that while there was no statute making that strike unlawful, there was an injunction against that strike, a restraining order laid on all the mine leaders and workers and every man to whose knowledge that injunction process should come, with the indefinite pains and penalties behind a violation of that injunction, to be applied through contempt proceedings. Therefore, in that coal strike situation there was, to all intents and purposes, a law against strikes, with the most fearful kind of penalties, because they were indefinite—fine or imprisonment, or both, without limit.

Now, then, that being the case, may I not ask the Senator if it is not true that, regardless of pains and penalties, men will strike if they desire, and you can not stop them by law?

Mr. STANLEY. I entirely concur with the Senator, and further on in this argument I will come to a brief résumé of the utter failure of such legislation. Take the instance that the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Delaware have quoted. Originally, the coal miners of Pittsfield were prohibited, under the most dire pains and penalties, from forming any character of organization, or from quitting the service of their masters by any kind of agreement. For centuries that was the law. The man dug the coal, and the woman, with a leather thong about her neck, clad in a single garment, with a chain fastened to the thong and extending between her arms and her limbs, like a beast of burden, dragged it to the light. Her body was torn and maimed by the cruel links. They were dwarfed and hideous and dirty and ignorant, and philanthropists said that God could not see them, because they were in the darkness and in the bowels of the earth. One day they walked out into the light, and they said, "The last leather thong has been fastened to the body of wife or mother or daughter. You shall have beasts of burden to carry this coal to the light of day. We will die or starve or go to prison, but we will not go back into the mines as long as our women are hitched to these cars."

That was the first strike among the miners. That was their first organization. Great Britain, for a thousand years, attempted to hold these men in the mines by every character of drastic legislation, by every character of fine and imprisonment; and to-day she has wiped the whole thing off her statute books, and has affirmatively legalized and affirmatively guaranteed to labor the right to quit. What is true there is true in New Zealand, true in Australia, true in every country that ever attempted to make a vast body of men work against their will.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a preliminary to a question, I want to refer for just a moment, if the Senator will allow me, to the statement just made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. STANLEY. Why, certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the great body of our people are law-abiding. They intend to respect the law. It was not assumed by them that there was any law that would permit the injunction granted by the Indiana judge. On the contrary, they protested most earnestly that there was no law which authorized an injunction of that character, and they proceeded upon the assumption that there was no law under which a judge could issue an injunction of that kind.

Now, I am not saying that the injunction was issued without authority of law. I do not attempt to revise or criticize the opinion of Judge Anderson nor his action, but I only say that the coal miners and the heads of the union representing the coal miners did not understand or believe that we had any law which would forbid a strike of that character; and, of course, if we have a law of that character, it is a part of the war legislation and will pass away when the emergency which created it passes away.

I am only saying that to put the history straight with regard to the effect of legislation of this character. I do not believe that the miners would have brought about a nation-wide strike in regard to the production of coal if at that time, when we were considering their difficulties and the inadequacy of their wages, we had had a provision of law under which their disputes could have been submitted to an impartial tribunal, just exactly as it is about to be submitted to an impartial tribunal, and settled in that way. We would have had no coal strike, because sensible, law-abiding men would have known, and they know now, that a government such as our Government will not do injustice to the great body of its people.

With regard to the illustration given by the Senator from Kentucky very eloquently and very truly, a provision of law prohibiting strikes, prohibiting the struggle that goes along with the strikes, without at the same time providing a tribunal for the just settlement of the disputes, whatever they may be, would be just as abhorrent to me as it is to the Senator from Kentucky, and the great failure of Great Britain in her advance along that path has been that Great Britain never has been willing to undertake the task of doing justice to her working people. The moment Great Britain is willing to assume the enlightened duty of adjudicating disputes between the working people of the country and their employers, then the case will be parallel to the one presented in this bill.

I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him at such length.

Mr. STANLEY. Just at that point, does the Senator from Iowa think that a citizen is under any higher obligation to obey an act of Congress than to obey the order of a court of competent jurisdiction? Here was a court of competent jurisdiction which said, as the President of the United States said, that the strike was illegal and unlawful.

Judge Anderson said that it was in clear contravention of the law of the land; and in addition to the weight of law, solemnly enacted, you had the injunction issued by the most determined, the most pitiless judge that ever sat on an American bench, as devoid of human sympathy as a marble column, and yet to a man they did not obey. If they would not obey under those circumstances, when they had the law, the President of the United States, and the court all warning them that their act was illegal, does the Senator think any other act would have any other effect?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator must remember that the strike had already occurred when these announcements were made.

Mr. STANLEY. Is there any difference between the lawlessness of a man who continues a strike after he knows it is against the law and that of the fellow who starts one?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not. I think there is no essential difference.

Mr. STANLEY. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the strike had already occurred when the appeal was made to the court, and the order that was issued was not directed to the men. It did not direct the men to return to work. It was directed against those who were before the court, the leaders; and, so far as we know, they claim at least that they gave the utmost respect to and obeyed implicitly the injunction that was issued. I do not know whether they did or not, but I am saying again that there was nothing that gave the miners any reason to believe that they would get any other or further justice than that they could secure at the hands of their employers. Now, if it is not in accordance with enlightened civilization to provide a tribunal to which every man and woman can go for justice, then I quite agree that the provision to make it criminal to strike ought not to find its way into the laws of the country; and I want the Senator from Kentucky to remember also that while we are using the word "strike," or the term "prohibition against a strike," this bill is not quite that.

I do not want to escape any responsibility for what it does really command. Under this bill every railroad man in the United States could leave his employment if he wanted to, every man could leave his employment after conferring with his fellow workmen, and leave without any violation of the law. It is only when a dispute has arisen and the strike or the concerted and agreed suspension of employment occurs in order to compel the employer to do the thing which the employees want done. It is that thing of which the Government takes jurisdiction in this bill and says whether the employers are right or the employees are right. It seems to me that there is a vast difference between that and compulsory employment. Every man is at liberty to take whatever employment seems most attractive to him and continue it just so long as he desires to continue it, and not a moment longer; and he can leave not only individually but in as large a company as he desires to gather about him, if he desires to do it. But he can not agree or combine with his fellow employees that he will prevent the movement of commodities in interstate commerce in order to coerce submission to the terms which he has proposed.

Mr. STANLEY. Let me interrupt the Senator. The Senator says the law provides that he shall not prevent the movement of interstate commerce. This law provides that he shall not prevent the movement of interstate commerce, as I understand it, by refusing or failing to assist in its movement, if that refusal is the result of an understanding between him and other employees.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. It has no such signification as that, if I correctly understand it.

Mr. STANLEY. That is my understanding of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. It simply means that here is a dispute which we may say all the employees of the country engaged in railroad service have with their respective employers. They are trying to settle it and they can not settle it. The employees do not want to leave the railroad service, they do not quit their work in order to indicate that they desire to seek some other field of employment, but they quit because they want, through the suffering and inconvenience which they will occasion, to compel the employer or employers to accede to the terms which are proposed. If it were a struggle only between the employers and the employees, I would be the last man to advocate any limitation or restriction upon the right to strike.

But a third and innocent party comes in at that point, and the railroads being originally operated for profit, of course you may deny them that profit, and I have not a word to say. But when you put it out of the power of the railroad companies to serve the commerce of the country, you have visited a very great injury upon innocent people, and I believe the time has come when we should have some means of settling those disputes and avoiding those calamaties.

I know very well that substantially the law which is proposed here has not worked well, not perfectly, at least, in one other country. It has never been proposed in any country save one, notwithstanding all that is said here about it. It was proposed in New Zealand.

Mr. STANLEY. They have had the same act in Australia, or practically the same act, over and over again.

Mr. CUMMINS. Where?

Mr. STANLEY. In Australia.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not think it is quite the same.

Mr. STANLEY. The same principle.

Mr. CUMMINS. These laws which provide for prohibition against strikes until an investigation can take place and which, after the investigation, cease to be of any binding effect, are not at all parallel with or similar to the law which we propose here.

The Senator from Kentucky and I have discussed this matter in the committee, and we know our respective views pretty well; but what would the Senator from Kentucky say about an agreement, we will say, between the producers of steel rails, that they would not sell any steel rails to the railways of the country, and allow these railways to fall into such condition as that the properties could not be operated, in order to accomplish some purpose which the steel companies had in view? I know that it is an utterly inconceivable case, but suppose that all of the farmers of the United States should enter into an agreement with each other that they would produce just enough for their own consumption, but would not produce anything for sale? Any farmer can do that if he desires to do it, of course, and he is at perfect liberty to do it. But what would the Senator say of a society which had reached the point where, with a perfect organization of farmers, they would all agree that they would plant just enough to feed their own families, and not one ounce of foodstuffs for general distribution? If we can not do something to avoid a situation of that kind, then the Government is a failure.

Mr. STANLEY. I will say to the Senator that combinations between tradesmen for the purpose of fixing the price or limiting the output of any commodity have been illegal since the statutes of Elizabeth, since the earliest monopolies in glass, and soap, and playing cards, and what not. Such a combination as that is illegal at the common law, is in contravention of the Sherman Act, and is in violation of the statutes of almost every civilized community, and such acts have been in force, have never been repealed, and have never been opposed by any intelligent legislator who believed in the freedom of commerce and of trade. I say that you can not apply that rule to agreements between men touching the conditions and compensation of their employment, because they are not identical things. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce has never in all his useful and splendid career done anything more worthy, or anything which has brought him more fame and affection among the people of this country, than the fine distinction which he himself has drawn when he said that labor is not a commodity.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I believe in that statement profoundly. I believe in it even more deeply than I did when it was proposed. But I do not believe that anyone should make a commodity of labor, and, as I remarked the other day, Mr. Fitzgerald or Mr. Foster or Mr. Gompers, or anybody else, should not be permitted to make a commodity of labor. I think it is just as bad for them as for Mr. Gary, or any of the other captains of industry, to make a commodity of labor.

Mr. STANLEY. Again, in answer to the statement of the chairman that men have no excuse for opposing the deprivation of a right where you afford them a tribunal to which they can go, and which will do them justice, give them something else just as good.

There is nothing that affects the community more, for instance, than marriage. Future generations depend on your wisdom and mine in selecting a companion for life, and for that reason kings and governments for years controlled that choice. There are eugenic uplifters who would do it now. What would the chairman say to a learned commission that should divest us of the right to select our own companions, look over the dames of the country, get one just as good or who would do just as well, and then if you do not marry her, put you in jail?

You have not provided a fair tribunal compensating us for the loss of the right to select our own wives.

There are certain rights that Jefferson believed were inalienable. The worst, the most pernicious thing that I see today confronting the American people, a peril greater than the red haze of war on our eastern shores, more far-reaching and pernicious in its consequences than the growls and the threats of the Bolshevists and the anarchists, is our utter departure from the principle that there is any such thing as an inalienable right, that there is any such thing as saying to an intermeddling government, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther."

It is not the province of government to feed men with a spoon, to circumscribe inalienable rights. There are certain rights that come from God, that no government ever created, that no government should ever destroy; and the right, with or without the consent and cooperation of my fellow workers, to work where I please and when I please, and for such compensation as I can secure, is as inalienable, as much a part of me, as inherent and as sacred, as the right to marry, as the freedom of speech or of conscience. That is the thing that this bill destroys, and when it does it is nothing more nor less than bald socialism. The whole scheme was born in the dreams of a lot of wild-eyed Australian socialists, and after they had tried it in their own country, after the law has produced the thing it was intended to prevent, after this thing had proved abortive and worthless wherever attempted anywhere else in the world, this committee has taken this discarded, this discredited, this exploded vagary, this dream of socialism, and incorporated it into this law, over the earnest, indignant protests of 2,000,000 of intelligent Americans, who say they will not wear this yoke.

Let us see what happens to the operation of this law. Says the chairman, "The injunction issued at Indianapolis was against a few leaders; this act reaches the individual workman." So much the worse. Do you know that under this act, if a man and his wife are making out bills of lading in a freight office, and their wage is the subject of discussion before any board on earth, and he says to his wife, "I have had an offer of better employment, and I am going," and she says, "I will go with you," and thereupon they quit, you can put them both in jail?

If an engineer and a fireman discuss what they are going to do before they do it, before they leave the engine, you can send them to jail. Do you think any court will ever do that? Why enact a law that you will be unable to enforce?

Another thing: As I have said, this is pure socialism. It is nothing more nor less. I defy the chairman of the committee, I challenge any member of the committee, to show me where this thing has ever been attempted to any great extent, that it has not been in a socialistic community, advocated by labor leaders and socialists.

There are men in the Senate who remember when New Zealand was peopled by wild men. Its civilization is but a half century old. A homogeneous company of men of moderate means settled in the Pacific islands and started a socialistic community. It was not as bloody as Bolshevism, because there was nothing to be gained by attempting to rob men when they had nothing, and they did not care to rob each other. It was as wild an idea as any dream of Carl Marx.

Every commission that ever was sent to investigate the Australasian socialism has declared that the thing was predicated upon the idea that a man's labor and the employer's property alike belonged to the State, and where the State had a right to say what the man should do with his property the State has a right to say what a man shall do with his body, and that was consistent. I do not care whether I am working in a mine or a mill or a factory or on a railroad, shall the State say to me, "I have the right to your labor whether you propose voluntarily to give it to this private concern or not, because the public good demands it?" What are you going to say to Mr. Lenin or Mr. Trotski or Carl Marx when they show you that the happiness of the public alike demands that the State take your property with my labor? It is worse than the socialism of Carl Marx, wilder than the heresies of Lenin and Trotski, because of the two my body is more sacred than my property.

Our Saxon sires, devoutly worshiping their personal independence, appreciating the sanctity of their clean, brawny bodies, while permitting their Government to take their flocks and their lands, refused to endure a blow or any form of personal indignity.

It is a dangerous thing, a dangerous thing to make a commodity of the body of a free man.

Another thing: When you adopt this proposition you will go to a maximum and minimum wage scale. You can not help it. A maximum and a minimum wage scale means an inefficient, listless body of political slaves. Why? As long as a laborer is permitted to make his own bargains, either collectively or individually, and his wage is inadequate, that is his affair. If the railroad does not pay him enough, he can dig coal. If that does not pay him enough, he can plow corn. Here in this wide domain, with its multitudinous and multifarious industries, the doors of opportunity open on every side, and the man who gets an insufficient wage has every opportunity to better his condition.

But when you say to me, "You shall not leave that throttle, you shall not leave that coach, you shall continue to lay rails or to walk track—when you compel me to stay there—you are under a moral obligation to give me an adequate wage; and when you fix a maximum and a minimum wage you destroy individual initiative.

I speak not as the sponsor for labor or any other class; it is the principle I oppose, and that principle is socialism. If there is one thing on earth I fear more than anything else in the way of a political heresy and a social menace, it is socialism. None of you would fear a widely extended strike if labor was not organized.

I am the known friend of organized labor. Labor, however, does not ask the aid of the Government in perfecting an organization. It is not the province of this or any other Government to dictate to employees in this regard. It is the right of the laborer to bargain individually or collectively, and no governmental agency should attempt to control its choice in that matter.

Do you know that this bill, as every other compulsory arbitration plan ever devised, presupposes the unionization of the employee? The House bill is more candid than the Senate bill. The House bill provides that the boards shall be made up of the heads of the various brotherhoods and unions. The Senate bill provides that the crafts shall name the boards. The same thing in effect. How can 10,000 trainmasters, for instance, or track walkers, scattered and unorganized from Hellsgate to the Pacific coast, send a representative?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. From Hellsgate to the Golden Gate?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes. You can not do it. You have to be organized. The provision is that the craft shall name these men. What will be the result?

If they look, as the chairman has said, to this board as the wise, just, able thing to fix their wage and protect their rights, do you not know that the advocate of organized labor must say, "You have been out of the union before, but you can not get to this board except through the door of the union," and he would organize every one of them. There never has been a compulsory arbitration measure enacted in New Zealand or Australia, or anywhere else, that it did not presuppose that it was based upon the complete unionization of the craft. Not only that, but in Australia and in New Zealand the law contained preferential clauses in favor of labor unions.

What has been done here? You have provided that the engineer can not get to the Government with his troubles, can not get to the board with his troubles, except through his craft; and the conductor can not do it.

There was an amendment offered here that certain ones were not organized and for that reason could not come in under the bill. You compel the men to organize in locals where they meet in secret and confer and consult. You say collectively they must present their demands, collectively they must ask these awards, and then "if they do not suit you and you collectively quit you go to jail."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not the Senator mistaken about that?

Mr. STANLEY. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing in the bill to require collective bargaining or to forbid collective bargaining, or to require collective appearance or to forbid it. The individual is just as free to come to one of the boards that are organized as is the union.

Of course, we understand perfectly—the Senator need not smile—that unions will do most of the work. But the Senator, I think, is wrong in saying that we require collective movement of any kind.

Mr. STANLEY. It is physically impossible for the individual to get to the board. You do not say "You shall go this way," but you leave certain doors open and the only doors that he can go through are the union doors. You say the craft shall name the boards and that they shall be selected from nominees of the craft. The House bill says the unions shall name them. If a man is not in a craft he has no voice in the naming of the judge to try his case.

Let us take the arbitration boards to see whether they are not a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. The labor men have spewed them out from their mouths because they know they amount to nothing. You have a board under the bill called a conciliation board. Half of the board is named by the craft, by the labor union. The other half is named by the railroads, the private corporations.

As a rule the Brotherhood of Firemen and Locomotive Engineers and the Order of Railway Conductors and the heads of the railroads act in harmony. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred they are both against the shipper. Through all the long fights I have witnessed during 12 years' service in Congress, when we were attempting to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with a little power to say when a rate was excessive—and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] will remember that long fight—the railroads themselves were no stronger against it than were the brotherhoods.

Any raise in rates is usually supported by the workmen. You have a board of wage conciliation. The employer and employee each through his representative meet to determine what is an adequate wage. The president of the road says: "If this thing is agreed to and it becomes a legal rate and we can not get a fair return on the movement of the traffic by reason of this increased cost, the Interstate Commerce Commission will be bound to increase our rates because this is a legitimate charge, and if the rate is not compensatory it is confiscatory."

Here is a charge supported by a mandate of law. What would become of that poor, voiceless, forgotten goat, the public, that pays the freight? The proposed board has no power on earth except to invite disputes that it can not settle; except to start fires that it can not put out.

What has been the experience of every country with such boards? Some claim that they have diminished strikes; all admit that they have increased the number of disputes. It is easy to get a hearing before such boards. I wish I had time to read a description of what occurred in New Zealand, from a discussion of this matter by a member of the Parliament of New Zealand. They had the same proposition, a bilateral board like the one proposed in this bill to hear disputes, and then if they could not agree they went to the highest authority, the governmental board. They said all disputes would be settled before they got there; but they found that they all went to the higher board, and it was utterly overwhelmed with work.

Not only that, but you are a thousand times worse off than if you did not have any board of conciliation at all. Why? Because you have in every court of justice the same method of conciliation that this board affords. It is equivalent to an act allowing A to employ two attorneys and B to employ two attorneys, and then if the attorneys can not agree to leave it to the judge. How many times do attorneys ever agree? What will be the result? The employees with their attorneys and representatives and the employer with his go before these boards. After they have discussed the matter until they have become inflamed and angered and set in their opinions, then they take the matter before a governmental board. How much better to take the matter before the governmental board in the beginning.

It is said that we should do this thing in order to secure the free movement of commerce. Is commerce on the land any more essential to national life than is commerce on the sea? Rome discovered, Carthage discovered, France discovered a thousand, two thousand, yes, three thousand years ago that nothing was worse than to stop the course of commerce. So they provided a very certain method of securing its movement. The motive power then was a man at the oar. To-day it is the man at the throttle. They chained the man to the oar so that he could not get away. I had fancied that the day of the galley slave was over, but this bill should be characterized as the latest and most approved method of fastening the conductor to his car and the engineer to his cab.

I wish to read here a description of how a similar provision worked in New Zealand. The industrial commission delegated to investigate this subject in New Zealand declared:

> Trade-unionism and collective bargaining are not only recognized but fostered as a national policy. This is reflected in provisions whereby only associations of either employers or employees may initiate proceedings before arbitration courts, and in the rapid growth of trade-unions in membership.
> The system has not prevented industrial disputes, which have, in fact, increased.

Dr. MacLaurin, of the New Zealand Parliament, years after the New Zealand bill was enacted, thus described its practical workings in that country:

> What I said about the compulsory conciliation act in January, 1898, has been abundantly emphasized by over two years of local history in the operation of that law. The act in question is a symbol of perpetual industrial war. * * * This law—

And it was almost identical with the proposed law we are now considering—> generates political strife, resentment, suspicion, and reprisals subversive of the State. It does not conciliate, but it exasperates, sets class against class, trade against trade. * * * It annihilates all semblance of brotherhood and simply encourages a spirit of contentiousness, leading employers and employed to coerce each other without leaving room for individual exhibition of the golden rule. It thus generates a slavish and vindictive spirit. The act is a menace to the body politic. * * *

> It was claimed that this (compulsory arbitration) act would bring about industrial peace, that strikes would be at an end, and that capital and labor would work together in harmony and with a certainty that there would be no disturbance. * * * Well might the employers say, as they did lately at Christ Church, that they intend to end the matter one way or another. Continued pin pricks become unendurable in time, and a sword thrust even might be welcomed if it ended an ever-existing trouble; and, bad as strikes are for everyone, it is questionable whether it would not be better to have a question fought out to the death than a state of things continually pressing, which tends to keep those who are interested in it in a state of unrest and irritation. * * *
> The feeling is growing that even an occasional strike would be preferable to everlasting disputes, and there is undoubtedly less good feeling now between employers and employed than existed before the act.

On July 12, 1907, Mr. Loughnan, another member of Parliament, discussing the operation of these boards, said:

> The wages board are, I understand—although the details have not been given to us—to be composed of experts in each particular trade—> and they will talk over matters in a friendly way and try to come to an understanding.
> Like this bill which is now before us—

That is all the board under this bill can do—

This was the intention of the framers of the original conciliation and arbitration act, but for some reason the conciliation boards did not conciliate. The arbitration court was intended only to be the "bogey man"—the compelling authority of last resort; but after the failure of conciliation so many united in rushing to take their grievances to the court that the machinery of the court was checked and the court was unable to get on with its business. The result was an enormous accumulation of business, and the act—I will not say that it became a dead letter, but its work became most unsatisfactory.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have not heard all of the Senator's observations, as I have been called from the Chamber several times; but, as I gather his position, it is this: That notwithstanding the progress we have made in civilization from the days of Rome and Carthage we can not devise any means to prevent strikes, any means of adjusting strikes, any means that will deal justly between capital and labor when controversies arise over wages, wage scales, and conditions of employment, but that the present method of war, of striking, must be continued.

Mr. STANLEY. No; I do not say that.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator suggest any other method of dealing with this problem—and it is a serious one—than that which is offered in the bill?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; a very simple one; simple but effective. It is the obvious that frequently escapes us. In this country men seek that employment which is most remunerative; a good job will draw a good man. If the coal operators are making large profits and the men who are with them, or any number of them quit, they will offer more wages and get others; that is the whole of it. Here, in a free country, where each man is looking out for the most remunerative employment, pass and enforce laws which will punish infractions of personal liberty, that will punish assaults upon men or the destruction of property. When such acts are committed by individuals the law already covers them; and I tell you that where a body of men, union men or others, I care not what, organize to do an unlawful thing they are guilty of conspiracy, because, as is familiar to all lawyers in the Senate, any combination by unlawful means to do a lawful thing or any combination to do an unlawful thing by lawful means is a conspiracy.

If you would prevent the lawless interference with the movement of commerce, enact legislation that wherever an employee of a railroad engaged in interstate commerce is assaulted—and, as I have said, if it is done by an individual the law as it is now written against assault and mere breach of the peace will be effective—but where he is assaulted pursuant to a conspiracy make it a felony, if you like, and then enforce the law. Then you will have the common sense and conscience of mankind behind you; you will have a law you can enforce.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator's position, he thinks that nothing can be done to prevent strikes other than, if laws are not sufficiently drastic enough now, to enact other laws to punish assaults and batteries and overt acts, and that we may not create tribunals and compel the employer and the employee to resort to those tribunals for the purpose of determining their controversies?

Mr. STANLEY. No; I do not say that. I am arguing against the fatal defects of this bill; I am not saying that you can not stop strikes. I am not advocating strikes; I am not defending them; but I am saying that this bill is a socialistic nostrum; that is all.

To digress a little further, there is—and I will come to it later on—a very interesting report of what I think was called the Whaley Commission, named by the British Government to investigate this question. They made a very elaborate report on it within the last year, to which I will refer further on. They do not think anything will put an end to strikes, but found that shop committees would probably be very effective in tending to decrease strikes. Where only a few men are employed in an industry there is possibly no danger from a strike, if one occurs, because no especial injury to the community follows. Danger only arises in the case of enormous concerns, like steel companies, employing ten thousand men or a hundred thousand men, and in vast mining and transportation enterprises. Even in those instances, however, the head of the concern is usually in close touch with the heads of the organization. I think it might be highly advisable and I am inclined to favor a law providing for shop committees and providing that various industries might name boards of arbitration, selected by the heads of departments and by the employees, and pending their determination of the matter it is highly improbable the industry would be menaced by a strike.

The strongest factor that broke the recent great railroad strike in Great Britain was public sentiment. The laboring people are just as eager to get public opinion on their side as is the owner of the plant. As De Tocqueville said in his wonderful review of democracy in America, public sentiment is the monarch here; it is more powerful than the President; it is stronger than the Army. When public sentiment speaks in this country, men heed it, as he well said, more quickly than the French heeded the edicts of the Grand Monarch, Louis XIV. You can utilize public sentiment. The Canadian law does that. It provides first for boards of conciliation and arbitration, to which both sides present their case. Then that report is sent to the leading labor journal, it is sent to all the daily papers in the Dominion, and a copy is sent to each of the contending parties. If either party accedes to the demand, then that is published and sent to the other party, and if he is in the wrong the whole force of public opinion is bent against him. Then, if he agrees to abide by that decision, that arbitration has the force and effect of a decree of a court and can be enforced.

What is arbitration, anyway? I do not mean to say that I am against every form of arbitration for the settlement of strikes, because I am against this impossible thing. Why, if the Senator from Utah please, this is called "compulsory arbitration." There is no such thing. You might as well talk to me about a square circle or a straight crookedness. If it is compulsory, it is not arbitration, of course. Arbitration is the settlement of a dispute by persons named by the disputants. There are three ways, and only three, of settling differences between men. One is by force of arms; another is by decree of court; the other is by arbitration. Now, a legitimate arbitration, a valid arbitration, an arbitration that is not bogus and a sham, is based upon the consent of the parties. I name one arbitrator, and you name another, and they name a third. We have a voice in it. This does not do that. This board is impotent. If it does not agree, the matter goes de novo before another board, one selected by neither, authorized by neither, but whose decrees have the effect of law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. In view of the conceded irreparable injury that comes to the public from these great strikes, particularly strikes that involve our transportation system, does not the Senator think there ought to be some method devised in this Christian age and in this Christian Nation to prevent strikes? Does the Senator think that the wisdom and the ingenuity of legislators, and of laboring men, and of the heads of our industries are utterly futile to evolve some plan that will prevent strikes, and that we must go on in the same old way that we are going now, with strikes in every State—and I think there is scarcely a State in the Union to-day where there is no strike—with all of the consequent harm and sorrow and injury and, indeed, death?

I do not know that this bill is a specific, that it will relieve against—I was about to say the intolerable situation which now exists; but it does seem to me that if this bill does not reach the situation we ought to try to devise some method by which we can prevent strikes. I would be the last man in the world to prevent a laboring man from securing his rights. I know the wrongs to which the laboring men have been subjected in the past, and perhaps in the present, in this country. I know that great corporations have been builded up by unjust exactions wrung from labor and from the consuming, toiling masses, and I know that they have secured high tariffs in order to boost prices here, and have brought pauper labor from abroad for the purpose of forcing down the price of labor in our land. Those things are intolerable, and they ought not to be permitted to exist, and I hope they never will be permitted to exist again in this land; and yet there ought to be some plan devised by which the public shall not suffer because of controversies between the employer and the employee, particularly where the industry is one affecting the public.

The controversy is not alone between the employer and the employee. Most of these wage controversies affect the public. The public have some voice; they have a right to be heard in these controversies, because they affect the lives and the welfare of the public. You are interested; I am interested; the wage earners themselves in New York and in Chicago are interested if there is a coal strike, or if the transportation systems of the country are tied up so that starvation will come to them; and it does seem to me that there ought to be some plan devised that will not infringe personal liberty, by which, in the future, these great strikes may be averted.

The Senator has just said, or at least I understood him to say, that the question of wage would solve the problem. I do not quite agree with him.

Mr. STANLEY. No; I do not say that.

Mr. KING. The Senator made an observation something like this when I asked him——

Mr. STANLEY. I hope the Senator will differentiate sharply at this point between those things which I might suggest as alleviating and those things which would prevent. There are certain evils which we can possibly prevent, like the invasion of the country. There are other evils, like intemperance or homicide or lawlessness, that you never can entirely stop. It seems—and I say it reverently—that God Himself has not so written His laws that they are all obeyed. I doubt if it is humanly possible to make every man continue in his employment, wherever it is, at the arbitrary mandate of the Government; but you can alleviate the situation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to suggest or even intimate that I would compel any man to assume any position that might be regarded as involuntary servitude. That would be intolerable in a Republic such as ours. The Senator, though, if he will pardon me just a moment, indicated, as I understood him, that this question would be solved or alleviated by the question of wages. I do not think that meets the situation. For instance, as the Senator from New Mexico stated a moment ago, take the question of coal mining, or the question of railroad transportation.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator misapprehended me. All I meant to say was that in a community where there are so many different opportunities, where wages vary so much in different professions and callings—for instance, at one time large amounts were paid to day laborers in the wheat fields in the West and at another time in the lumber camps—there is such a wide opportunity for a man to find employment, and each seeks the best employment, that any raise in compensation instantly attracts thousands of men who otherwise would pursue some other vocation; and that is, perhaps, the best strike breaker, after all—the fellow who comes peaceably and takes the work that the other fellow quits.

Mr. KING. The Senator understands that that could not be done in all cases, as I was about to observe.

Mr. STANLEY. No.

Mr. KING. Take the engineers, the brakemen, those who have been engaged in the transportation business. You could not go out among the mass of the people and recruit men, if there were a general tie-up of our railroads, to take charge of the trains and to operate them.

Mr. STANLEY. And yet, if the Senator will pardon me right there, that is exactly what they did in Great Britain. They got men to operate those locomotives.

Mr. KING. Well, they got a few, but they did not have a general resumption of business; and they had to call into requisition the motor cars and the busses, and so forth, for the purpose of transporting; and indeed the transportation then was very insufficient and defective, and it is a question, if the strike had not soon terminated, whether there would not have been the greatest sorrow and suffering. Yet, after all, you can not compare the little island of Great Britain, with its congested population and good roads, where after breakfast you can walk across the island, as the Yankee said, with the United States, with its great distances and its vast continent. You could not in a day, or in a week, or in a month, bring to coal mining, or bring to the operation of the railroads, in the case of a universal strike, a sufficient personnel for a resumption so that people would not suffer; so that the question of wages, no matter what you might pay, would not reach the difficulty. You might pay the engineers $1,000 a week, and if there were a general strike you could not resume business and save distress and sorrow throughout our country.

So the wage question is not the solvent for this evil. There must be some other way of meeting it. It does not meet the situation and provide an adequate remedy for this very unfortunate conditon that prevails in our country, where we have these persistent strikes.

I am very glad to hear the discussion, and I am not sure that this bill reaches it; but I am very anxious to have the Senator point out, if he can, some method by which, if possible, we can avert these strikes. If it is impossible, then we will have to go along in the old way, doing the best we can.

Mr. STANLEY. I hope the Senator will differentiate right here. He takes me on a wide field that is very interesting. In the first place, I admit that we have a sick body politic. Industrial dislocations, as they are called, have paralyzed industry at times and imperiled the comfort and safety of the community; but it will not do to say to the doctor who objects to a certain remedy for a sick patient, "You object to curing the patient." It does not follow because I do not subscribe to this remedy either that I am in favor of strikes or that I believe that they are uncontrollable. I think there are many, many simple means of reaching these conditions.

Has the Senator from Utah ever thought of the proposition that a few years ago strikes were almost unknown in the commerce on the Great Lakes? No such thing was ever heard of as a general strike there. Now they are common. Then the commerce upon the Great Lakes was carried on by men who owned their own ships. The owner of the vessel started out as a boy before the mast or a cabin boy, and grew up with men of his own race, hardy Americans, who spoke his own language, called each other by name, and stood by one another in hours of peril. Wrecks were almost unknown. By and by a single corporation took control of that vast shipping, until to-day it is greater in tonnage than all the tonnage in New York Harbor and the combined tonnage of all our navigable streams. Men were put upon these vast steamers and these ore boats who spoke a jargon of every tongue on earth. Their employer was in Chicago or in Pittsburgh. They were known by their numbers. You had all kinds of strikes. Strikes are due in great measure to the distance between employer and employee and the lack of touch and the lack of understanding. Nothing reconciles man to man so much as personal contact. Legislation that will prevent combinations in restraint of trade, legislation that will allow smaller and more active and more efficient industries to live against combinations. A rigid enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act will do more than such bills as this, a thousand times more, to prevent this very thing. I am firmly convinced that the enforcement of the law against the things that produce strikes and then a rigid enforcement of the law against the lawless acts of strikers will prevent not so much the contemporaneous quitting as the evils often incident to it.

It is in the violence, in the intimidation, in the lawlessness, in the turmoil—these things are all wrong. In this very extensive term we have included these things, and also the personal liberty of the individual. In attempting to prevent things that are altogether wrong we are trying to prevent other things that no self-respecting free man can afford to give up. I believe we can ameliorate this condition. I believe that in a free country like this there is no business in the world that can not be operated, if the law is strong enough to protect the man who is operating the business from acts of lawlessness and violence and intimidation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. This bill, of course, is one of the most important bills that we can possibly have before us for consideration.

Mr. STANLEY. If the Senator will pardon me right there, I concur with him to the extent of believing that this is the most vital legislation, the most perilous legislation, means more of good or evil to the commercial interests of this country, than any legislation we have before us.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. We are all interested and anxious to bring about the right solution, and I should like to get the Senator's views regarding another method for handling this strike proposition.

In my State, more in former years than at present, the sheep industry was handled by running sheep in bands of two or three thousand out upon the public domain, at all times under the care of a herder. By legislation it was made a criminal offense for a herder to abandon his flock.

Mr. STANLEY. At what point, Senator? Excuse me for interrupting, but I think the Senator has presented a hard nut to crack. I want to get exactly what the law prevented, in order that I may be able to answer the question. Did the law compel the man to stay for any indefinite time, or prevent his leaving that herd before certain notice of an intention to quit, and certain opportunity afforded to employ somebody else in his place?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can not at this time recall the specific language of the statute, but the substance of it was the law against abandonment. I assume that if the herder were to give notice to his employer that he must leave the employ, and therefore the care of the flock, it would not be an infraction of the law.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not sure, but I am under the impression that at this time a man can not abandon an engine 100 miles from its destination or from its roundhouse. I believe that if an engineer now, like the herder, would start with 500 passengers, and when they were out in the middle of the plains leave them there in the snow, abandon his engine, and refuse to go farther, he could be punished. An engineer now is morally compelled, if not by direct mandate of the law, to bring his engine in and turn it over to the hostler before quitting his employment. That is the thing that your law aimed at. With these sheep away out there without a shepherd, if they passed a law it would be perfectly proper to say to that man as a condition of his employment, "When you take this employment you take it subject to the condition that you shall not abandon your flock." It is just like an engineer, if he goes out on the mountains with 200 passengers or 10,000 tons of freight, he must carry that freight in. The same principle of law applies as with seamen. A seaman can not leave his ship save in a safe harbor. That is an old principle of law, and I am heartily in favor of its enforcement wherever it applies.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator has anticipated precisely the application which I intended to make—in part. Let us extend that application a little further. We all know that a universal strike will affect materially the general public welfare. I understand the Senator to be agreeable to the idea that you might prevent a man quitting his work where that would endanger property.

Mr. STANLEY. Or life.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Or life; and give to the employer reasonable opportunity to get another employee. The public is interested in the conduct of this transportation business. Does the Senator believe that a law could be enacted which would make it a penal offense for the employees to strike en masse until the public or the company had an opportunity to put some one in their places and carry on the operation of the road?

Mr. STANLEY. Right at that point, I think it is a very, very pertinent suggestion that the Senator has made. I think these common carriers are quasi public-service corporations; in fact, they are public-service corporations, so far as their action is concerned, and I am vividly conscious of the fact that the employee of a railroad is very close akin to a public servant; that is, to the man who is in the employ of the Government or of a municipal corporation; that he in a way is a protector of society as well as a mere producer of an essential commodity; and I would go as far as I can go, preserving always inviolate a man's right to work or to leave work wherever that action does not immediately entail some injury.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STANLEY. As soon as I answer this question I will be glad to yield.

I believe the Government has a right to say to employer and employee, "You shall make a certain kind of contract." I believe they would have a right to require, and that the employees themselves could agree, that no employee, except for sickness or some reason like that, should quit his employment without sufficient notice; and I believe if it were made punishable for a railroad to discharge a man without notice or a man to quit a railroad without notice that would do much to stop strikes. I believe we could do it without any personal invasion of the liberty of the employee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was asking the question for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Senator legislation which, I understand, exists in the Dominion of Canada, where it is provided that the employees shall not strike until a given time after the investigation of the trouble.

Mr. STANLEY. Or pending the investigation. I have a copy of the act.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to know of the Senator if some such provision as that would be a wholesome provision?

Mr. STANLEY. I am rather inclined to favor some provisions in it. They might do much to ameliorate conditions.

Tuesday, December 16, 1919.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, at the conclusion of my remarks on yesterday I called the attention of the Senate to the inevitable inefficiency invariably resulting from the multitudinous experiments with any system of Government control of labor through the means of alleged compulsory arbitration.

These arbitration boards, whether in Australia, or in New Zealand, or where not, all operate upon the same general principle; that is, a board of conciliation or arbitration is selected composed of representatives from both sides. In this bill it is called the board of wages and working conditions. The findings of this board go to some real tribunal named by the Government, whose determination has the force and effect of law.

It is not necessary to examine the precedents. A look into the working of the thing will convince any careful analyst of its inevitable result. Here are the representatives of the craft and the representatives of the employer endeavoring to reach a satisfactory wage. As long as the traffic will bear it, whether it has been among railroads or in private industrial institutions, the result has been to raise the wage. It does not matter whether men are mining coal or spinning cotton or operating a railroad, as a rule they are always willing to stand a raise in wages, provided that raise shall apply to all who are engaged in the industry in the country, and let the ultimate consumer absorb it.

In addition to that, as I called to the attention of the Senate yesterday, this is compulsory arbitration. The man is commanded to work, not because the conditions are suitable or the compensation satisfactory, but because the law commands it, and you can not in fairness compel a man to work without affording him a compensatory wage. For that reason a minimum wage has already accompanied a compulsory arbitrament of the question.

In a report made by the board of wages and working conditions under conciliation and arbitration acts of Australia and New Zealand, Mr. Aves to the Right Hon. H. J. Gladstone, in 1908, after a thorough review of this system in both countries, says:

> But the real conditions of industry are very far from being determined simply by the wages that have been paid, and if laid bare I think the attendant conditions, when coupled with the increasing inefficiency, lack of interest in work, and trade-union intervention, would be found to be a greater cause of discontent and dissatisfaction among employees than the nominal wages fixed.

Another distinguished author has said:

> I am quite sure that the arbitration system has resulted in the loss of industrial efficiency far greater than ever resulted from strikes.

A thorough and exhaustive report on the working of compulsory and conciliatory and arbitration laws was made by the royal commission, a commission that visited all the countries in which these boards were in operation, and made anything but an unfavorable report. I call the attention of the Senate, however, to this pertinent paragraph, the thing that seems to have been overlooked by those who are studying simply its effect upon the employer and the employee and overlooking the rights and interest of the general public.

They said:

> The effect of the working of the act—

As far as the general public is concerned, and that is the thing in which we are principally interested here—> has been undoubtedly to make the public to pay generally more for the products of an industry which has been regulated by a board or the court, when the tariff is high enough or other conditions occur to prevent foreign competition. I have already pointed out that, in the boot trade, the conditions imposed are such that outside producers are able to leap the tariff fence, and a Member of the House of Representatives said to me, "If the present duties are done away with the act may as well be repealed as far as raising wages in the manufacturing industries is concerned." The coal-mine owners agreed upon an advance in price when the cost of hewing was raised, and the flour millers acted similarly. Building has become more expensive, and in this trade the contractors at first made very little opposition to the claims for advance in wages, secure as they considered themselves in the ability to pass on the extra cost of construction to those who required their services. Now, however—> they are of opinion that the tendency of the awards is likely to narrow the scope of their business, and they are making efforts to oppose more effectually the demands of the men. Cost of living, particularly rent, is becoming dearer, I was informed.

And this should give us pause at this time—

The inevitable result of allowing the employer and the employee to agree on the wage, and then authorizing the Government to give that agreement the force and effect of law, the public unconsidered and unrepresented, is to arbitrarily raise wages. Australia and New Zealand abandoned every semblance of free trade, closed their ports when they went to this pernicious policy, and kited wages so high that they were only stopped when the cost of living became acute.

Are we prepared at this time to adopt a policy whose friends admit results in inefficiency among the laborers and increased cost of the product of labor?

In my opinion the fear that haunts the minds of Members of the Senate and of members of the committee and has induced them to adopt this dangerous expedient, the fear that there will be a universal dislocation of transportation business in the United States, a universal paralysis of the whole movement of commerce from ocean to ocean, is unwarranted. It never occurred before and we have no reason to apprehend that it will occur in the future.

A strike, especially among the employees of common carriers, among engineers and firemen and conductors, is a dernier resort to which they never come except after long negotiations and a failure to reach any kind of agreement. These strikes, these disagreements, are the result of the failure of the employees to concur or to agree in some arrangement with their employer. Is it possible that when you have turned the roads back to not less than 20 nor more than 35 separate and distinct corporations, that each one and all of the corporations will have the same trouble at the same time? If they are local, if the walkout occurs upon one road and not upon the other, then you are not face to face with the evil and need no new legislation to handle it, and there is no reason to apprehend that it will be universal in the future any more than it has been in the past.

Now, let us suppose the thing should occur. Let us suppose that 2,000,000 men should at the same time and by common agreement all quit their work at the stroke of the clock. Remember the bill, as the chairman of the committee has said, is not like the injunction at Indianapolis. It is not directed against a half a dozen labor leaders. It applies to all, says the chairman, and that is true. It is a fundmental principle of the law of conspiracy that where a number of men agree to do an illegal thing it does not matter about the extent to which each participates in the enterprise, they are all equally guilty.

If 100 men agree to commit a robbery and 95 out of the 100 act as mere pickets, all are guilty. The same applies here. If they all agree to walk out you have 2,000,000 men who have violated an act of Congress. What are you going to do with them—put them all in jail? In 1910 the prisons of the United States accommodated a little over 111,000 men. You would have to put 20 men in each cell, if you had deputy marshals enough and soldiers enough and civil officers enough to apprehend and incarcerate 2,000,000 men. When you did, when the last railroader was in prison, who would run your railroads? If you could go and find new men to run the roads after imprisoning these men, would it not be easier to find them before you imprison them?

You know and I know and the employees upon the railroads know that the law can not in the nature of things be enforced. The only reason for passing it is the frail hope that it will never have to be executed; that it will never be violated.

The laws of the Supreme Judge, from whose decrees there is no appeal and from whose punishment and vengeance there is no escape, are violated. The children of Israel violated them before the thunders of His wrath had ceased to reveberate about Sinai's flaming top. No law has ever been written yet by God or man that has not been violated, and yet we are told that while we know this act is impotent, while we know it can not be enforced, we believe the moral effect, the sanction of it, will be such that the men will obey it, although they have told you that they will not.

The act not only never prevented a strike and never will, but the history of it in every country that has ever tried it shows that it is the most provocative thing of strikes and dislocations and revolts among labor that has ever been conceived by the wit of man. I know of nothing more interesting than the funeral orations which were delivered over the act in the New Zealand Parliament after 10 years of trial and the admission of utter failure, of failure so ludicrous and pathetic as to amount to a legislative and judicial fiasco and a farce.

In discussing the failure of an act which the chairman of the committee says in all respect is like this, that in every essential resembles it, this act is a twin of the dead New Zealand experience. Said Mr. Rigg, a member of the Australian Parliament, on July 1, 1908:

I have said it was a mistake to suppose that strikes could be prevented by coercive legislation; yet this is what we attempted (p. 48). Now, sir, I have already said that we committed a great error when we made that change. What has been the result? We have found that we have put a law on the statute book that we have been unable to enforce, and no one seems capable of suggesting any effective and proper means of enforcing it. Let me remind the honorable gentlemen that threats of imprisonment were used to compel the payment of fines under the act; that, in fact, writs of attachment were issued against strikers which entailed imprisonment if they had not been respected. Again, we know that where there is an extensive strike, and especially where the strikers are assisted and mutually supported by other unions, it is impossible to enforce the law by imprisonment—quite impossible. Without considering the obvious difficulty of accommodating as prisoners a very large number of our fellow citizens, to enforce it would be to deprive employers during the term of imprisonment of the very labor they can not do without and thus to prolong all the evils that arise from the strike itself.

This brings me to the next method of enforcing the law, which is by fine, and I ask, Is it possible to recover the fine? I say no.

This man is speaking from 10 years' experience with the operation of the act under his own eyes.

We have had recently, first, a union distributing its funds in order that they might not be attached, and then we have had the case where the goods of the strikers have been distrained, a number of articles seized, and, when put up to auction, bought in for 12s. 6d. by an interested party and returned to the owners. Now we are adopting another method, which is the attachment of wages over and above the sum of £2 a week. Now, without expressing any opinion as to the legality of such a course, let me ask, Supposing the attachment of wages results in the men refusing to work any longer, how are you going to enforce the payment of the fine? Have you not then reproduced the conditions that existed during the strike? The strikers who have been fined say, "So long as our wages are attached by the court we will not work," and that means of recovering the fine is destroyed.

I call the attention of the Senate to another brief and graphic description of the expiring agonies of the same act in the first country that ever tried it. I quote here from the Federationist:

For the first 12 years after the adoption of compulsory arbitration in Australasia its advocates had many reasons for satisfaction. The grievances and the wrongs of the men were so obvious that no court could refuse them awards, so the workers were satisfied. As the adoption of the law coincided with the period of prosperity the employers did not seriously object to increased wages.

As long as you agree to boost wages it works. Have you any need of law on a rising scale? Are wages rising fast enough in this country to suit you, or do you want to put this thing in under them and give them another shove upward?

The high tariff wall—

That is another thing that is necessary as well as the minimum wage scale. You can not operate this proposition without excluding labor, that is governed by the law of supply and demand, and not by boards and commissions. Wages should rise according to a natural demand and not according to the maneuvers of boards and commissions, to the detriment of the general public.

Beginning with 1901, however, dissatisfaction developed among the workers. This culminated in a long series of strikes, beginning in 1906, when a strike occurred on the tramways in Auckland. In 1907 there was a large strike among the slaughtermen. In 1908 the coal miners went out—

All in the teeth of this law.

The same year the motormen and the conductors in Auckland struck, and the bakers of Wellington. The labor report for New Zealand for 1908 showed 23 strikes, affecting 2,389 men, and since then strikes have increased in number and in scope.

In February, 1907, the slaughterers demanded an increase in wages. The packers refused to grant this and referred the question to the arbitration court. Knowing that the court would consume the most valuable time of the season in reaching a decision, which in the end would probably be unfavorable, the men struck illegally. The four principal centers of the packing business were tied up. This desperate situation forced the employers to grant the increase. The court was in a dilemma, for "the law must be upheld." They arrested the slaughterers and fined them $25 each. It was a long and tedious process. Men were numerous and hard to identify. Those brought in were searched, but the $25 was not forthcoming. The wheels of justice ground slowly; when summer was ended many unfined slaughterers had vanished. The law had been defied with impunity; it was impotent to prevent the strike and could not enforce the penalty for striking.

The necessity of enforcing the law prompted the Government to increase the penalties for its violation. In the future anyone who struck while a case was pending might be fined, and in lieu of the fine his goods confiscated or the man himself imprisoned. Any labor union ordering a strike, or permitting its members to strike, must pay a fine. Then, lest the unions evade the law by withdrawing their registration, the fine for striking was extended to all trades supplying a utility or necessity whether the trades were organized or not.

Strikes among the slaughtermen have been especially numerous in New Zealand, and for that reason are counted separately in the labor reports. In the year 1908–9 penalties were inflicted on workmen in 266 cases, the fines aggregating $6,650, of which, at the end of six months, 58½ per cent remained unpaid.

In 1908, after having presented their grievances again and again and receiving no answer except the dismissal of the men making the complaints, miners struck. Preparatory to action they divided their union funds among the individual members to prevent their being levied on for fines. The employers invoked the new law. The household goods of the men were seized—cook stoves, sewing machines, and furniture, including articles owned by wives before marriage. The goods must be sold at public auction, but buyers there were none. Finally a smiling man offered $1.25 for the whole lot, and got it. Before night the miners' goods had been returned to the miners' homes. Thus it was again plain the law could be defied with impunity. Enforcement of law depends on popular sentiment or concept of justice.

Mere enactment of legislation is no remedy. Compulsion can not be extended beyond certain limits.

The law referred to, it will be understood, was perfectly fair; that is, it was ambidextrous; it applied to both sides. The law provided heavy pains and penalties against the employer who did not raise wages on demand. The boot and shoe makers of New Zealand refused to obey an award of the commission; at least they closed their shops and boots and shoes were imported. Then the workmen turned on the law.

J. Stephen Jeans, late secretary of the Iron and Steel Institute, in a comprehensive review of the whole question, has this to say about compulsory arbitration:

Practically, however, all experience and precedents up to the present time are dead against compulsion in any form. You can not very well compel a man to agree to submit to reference whether he shall be required to work for a certain employer for a certain wage at a certain time. This must be left entirely to the man's own choice. Nor can you deal differently with a body of men, however numerous, so long as they have broken no laws and rendered themselves amenable to no penalties. Workmen must be continued in the enjoyment of the right to dispose of their labor at whatsoever price they like, and this being so they can not be compelled to arbitrate as to what the price of that labor shall be or as to any other general condition affecting its value and duration.

In my humble opinion, you are attempting to incorporate into this act a foolish and indefensible expedient highly offensive to labor, utterly useless to capital, and eminently calculated to produce the very evils it is designed to correct. Such legislation has often produced strikes by the wholesale. It has never settled one, it has never prevented one, and it never will.

Prof. John R. Commons, of the University of Wisconsin, and Prof. John B. Andrews, authorities of national repute, have written an exhaustive work upon this subject, entitled "Principles of Labor Legislation." With no political bias, without the question being agitated, speaking not as advocates but friendly to many provisions of the law, they review with pertinent comments the history of compulsory arbitration in Australia. They say:

* * * Turn now to the turbulent history of New South Wales. * * * This one State furnishes more than half of the days lost by strikes in all of Australia. * * * After a futile voluntary arbitration law of 1892, New South Wales passed its first compulsory law in 1901. * * * The act expired in 1908. The single court had not disposed of the cases brought before it with sufficient rapidity. The antilabor ministry in power at that time adopted a comprehensive system of wage boards modeled after the Victorian system, whose determinations were subject to appeal to a special court of arbitration—

The exact provision which is contained in this proposed legislation—

All strikes were declared illegal. A system of fines was adopted to reach the union funds. Strikes, almost of the character of rebellion, followed, and the next year the same ministry rushed through a bill applicable to strikes in certain necessary industries, like coal mining. These provided a penalty of not exceeding 12 months' imprisonment for instigating strikes, and the same length of time for mere participation in a strike meeting—

What was the effect of that on the coal-mining industry?

Immediately there followed a strike of all the coal miners in New South Wales—

They accepted the challenge instantly—

The situation became intolerable, and the Labor Party came back to power. A new act was passed in 1912. The severe penalties were withdrawn, and special conciliation boards were created for mine workers.

But neither under antilabor ministries nor under the present labor ministry is New South Wales industrially quiet. Frantic assertion of authority has been followed by flabbiness in the administration of the law. This has resulted in a series of headless strikes. The officials of the union, who might be prosecuted, make a show of dissuading the men—and the men strike with neither political nor economic consequences, as the Government will not prosecute the rank and file, and the employer is bound by the awards. Practically the compulsory arbitration system of New South Wales has become an imperfect wage-board system.

Have we not had a similar experience recently in Indiana?—

The act of New South Wales was repealed. A provision was placed in the law of 1912 mildly reprobating strikes and in certain instances punishing them as a misdemeanor, and again the laborers struck.

The mild act of 1912 was not anything like as obnoxious as the previous one. Under it a strike or lockout was regarded not as criminal but rather as an extravagant expedient, liable to penalization extending to a charge on any moneys then or thereafter due to the person ordered to pay such penalty. The court was also authorized to grant a writ of injunction to restrain any person from continuing to instigate or to aid in a lockout or strike, the maximum penalty being imprisonment for six months.

In protest against and in defiance of this act, in a country containing less than 1,000,000 adult males, there followed in one year 289 dislocations, involving 144,704 men, and entailing the appalling loss of 2,861,595 working days, with the result that the objectionable provision was repealed in the following year by an amendment establishing the principle that strikes and lockouts, with certain exceptions, were expressly recognized as lawful.

Every country that has ever attempted to enact such a law as we are now attempting to enact has precipitated strikes, with the result that the law has been repealed and the right of laborers to quit the employment and personal service of any man or corporation without let or hindrance has been expressly recognized. Canada has done so; New Zealand has done so; New South Wales has done so; England has done so; and yet, in the teeth of these multitudinous failures everywhere in the civilized world wherever the attempt has been made, conservative men at this crucial time, at this perilous time, are endeavoring to revive this indefensible experiment.

Great Britain and Canada alike, admitting the impotency and folly of such provisions as this, have incorporated into the law express provisions recognizing the right of men to quit and guaranteeing immunity to employees who individually or collectively protest against objectionable working conditions by a refusal to longer endure them.

After more than 10 centuries of experience with every character of legislation penalizing combinations among employees or any character of interference in the relations of master and servant, employer and employee alike, in Great Britain have joined in the utter repudiation of the whole scheme of compulsory arbitration.

As I said on yesterday, we have had for 2,000 years experience with legislation similar to this. Senators will remember from the reading of Blackstone that it was a fixed principle of English law for five centuries that any combination among workmen for the purpose of extorting an increased wage or otherwise inconveniencing an employer was illegal; that any interference between a man and master was a misdemeanor or worse.

Very recently this whole question has been subjected to the most exhaustive inquiry by the Whitley Commission. In commenting upon the report of this commission, Mr. Joseph Horton, British correspondent of the Iron Trade Review, of August 1, 1918, thus summarizes the result of the findings of this commission.

These are not the protests of labor; these are the cold and deliberate judgments of capitalists and of employers of workmen. I quote from the Iron Trade Review of August 1, 1918:

Should employers and employees be compelled to submit their disagreement to arbitration? Should employees be compelled to remain at work while disagreements are being arbitrated? These were among the big questions studied by the commission appointed to investigate industrial unrest in Great Britain. In the latest report of the commission both questions are answered in the negative. The Whitley investigation commission, as the board is called, found that neither employer nor employee favored compulsory arbitration.

In this the second article written by the Iron Trade Review's British correspondent dealing with the British labor problem, the commission's reasons for its findings are set forth. It is pointed out that the mainstay of British industrial peace is the frank discussion of problems between employers and employees, and voluntary arbitration in all cases where such discussion fails to bring about the desired results.

The commission is strong in its advocacy of industrial councils in the various industries as a reliable means of arriving at a satisfactory understanding. The success of the voluntary arbitration plan has been founded on the confidence of both employers and employees in their arbitrators.

If it is not possible to enforce such an act in little islands, in thinly populated countries, how will it be possible to enforce such an act in this great country? The male adult population of New South Wales and of New Zealand does not equal the number of men now in the service of our railroads. There are not 600,000 adult, able-bodied workmen in either New South Wales or in New Zealand. There are more men in the employ of the common carriers of the United States than there are men, women, and children in either one of these countries; and yet these little, thinly populated countries could not enforce such an act on account of the number of men it affected. What are you going to do with 2,000,000 of men?

Mr. President, I have followed this committee and its great work with interest and with admiration. Its members have brought learning, experience, patience, and courage to the solving of an immense problem and to the performance of a titanic task. You have revolutionized a great industry in America. You have taken these roads from the control of the State Governments and placed them under Federal control. You have supervised and controlled the issuance of their securities, the payment of their rates, the organization of the corporations.

If we must make this attempt, let it be done in another bill and at another time. This all-important and vital legislation should not be shackled, should not be endangered by this provision, requested neither by master nor by servant, and sternly, and I think wisely, opposed by millions of men directly affected by it. This bill contains many things which are wise and good and more which are untried and new.

We are about to reorganize and revolutionize a system of transportation which equals in extent and value the mileage of all other railroads on the globe; we have provided for the reorganization of the corporations which have hitherto controlled and operated these systems; we have transferred them from the jurisdictions of the State to the Federal Government; we have regulated their earnings and the issue of their securities. The industrial peace and prosperity of this Republic rests in great measure upon the success and the great work this committee has attempted and to which it has given earnest thought and indefatigable attention and to which it has brought the talents and the experience of men who have given years of their lives to an understanding of this titanic problem. To make the reorganization of railroads and their return to private ownership a success you need not only the cooperation of presidents of banks and railroads, of financiers and traffic managers, you need the cordial, capable, enthusiastic cooperation of the 2,000,000 men who have operated this vast machine with such signal energy and efficiency. Were this some new industrial panacea, not branded all over with demonstrated failure wherever tried, it would still be objectionable at this time. Owners and operatives alike have problems enough to solve, and in their solution we need the cordial and capable cooperation of master and of man. It is not necessary, it is not wise, to endanger the success of the whole scheme by provoking the sullen opposition of those upon whom the expeditious and efficient movement of the commerce of America admittedly depends.

For the reasons assigned I offer an amendment providing for the elimination of the whole plan of compulsory arbitration from the pending measure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have received a letter to-day from the representative of the Farmers' National Council, which he asks may be read and printed in the RECORD. I am glad to ask that this be done. He claims to represent a large number of voters in the State of Washington and to speak their views regarding this bill. I ask that the letter may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FARMERS' NATIONAL COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1919.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Room 445, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR JONES: At the request of the Washington State Grange, of the executive committee of which I am a member, and representing the triple alliance of Washington State, including the Grange, the State Federation of Labor, and the Railway Brotherhood, I have come to Washington to oppose the Cummins bill and the Esch bill for the return of the railroads, and to urge most strongly that the period of Government operation of the railroads be extended for two years in order that we may have an opportunity, after a fair trial, to determine whether or not Government operation of the railroads is advantageous to the American people.

I am confident that 200,000 voters of Washington State, all those who understand the Cummins and Esch bills, are opposed to their enactment, and feel that it is fundamentally unjust to the men, women, and children of America that legislation of such vital importance should be rushed through without fair and just discussion. We oppose the guaranteeing of dividends to the railroads, as provided in the Cummins bill, since such guaranty of 6 per cent interest will place a premium upon inefficiency and waste and petty graft—more, it will make them inevitable.

On behalf of these organizations I respectfully request that you will have this communication read to the Senate and incorporated in the RECORD, that it may be known to all Members of the Senate that the people of Washington State, who so vigorously, earnestly, and with such self-sacrifice worked for the winning of the war, overwhelmingly oppose the principles of the Cummins and Esch bills and demand that matters of such vital importance shall be determined only after thorough discussion and understanding.

Yours, respectfully,

FRED J. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on page 58, line 25, I propose the following amendment: After the word "carriers," I move to insert the words "including sleeping-car companies."

I may remark that there has been some question as to whether the employees of the sleeping-car companies come within the proper interpretation of the words "upon railway carriers subject to this act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, line 25, after the word "carriers," it is proposed to insert the words "including sleeping-car companies."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. In section 43, page 89, after line 13, I move to insert the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 89 of the bill, in section 43, it is proposed to insert, after line 13, as a separate paragraph, the following:

Through rates for transportation wholly by railroad shall be made for the entire ordinary transportation service from point of origin to the destination and delivery at the depots, warehouses, team tracks, or other usual unloading places; and in case of ordinary live stock destined to be received at public stockyards, to include the service of unloading and delivery of inbound shipment into suitable pens, and receipt and loading of outbound shipments; such to be deemed the carrier's facilities. This provision shall likewise apply to other than ordinary live stock destined to or received from such stockyards handled in the same manner, provided that where by reason of the extraordinary value of the animals or their condition it is reasonably necessary for their proper care and handling, such additional service as is reasonably necessary in properly caring for the same, the unloading and delivery or loading thereof may be required by the carrier of the shipper, which, if not furnished by him, shall be furnished by the carrier, and reasonable charge made therefor against the shipper, all of which shall be carried in tariffs and subject to the determination of the commission.

Public stockyards are those used as facilities for handling live stock at places of sale, purchase, and slaughtering, including those at which the Department of Agriculture maintains inspection of meat animals for slaughter, and such other places as the commission may find in common use for handling or buying and selling live stock by carloads, to be designated by the commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this proposed amendment has been brought to my attention by the American National Live Stock Association, of which Judge Cowan, of Fort Worth, is the general counsel.

The reasons that have been submitted to me for the adoption of the amendment are that it has become the practice of the railroad companies, or those connected with the railroad companies, to separate their charges, and when a shipper, especially a live-stock shipper, asks what the rate is from the point of origin to the point of delivery, which is a stockyard, the rate is given according to the published tariff, and then the railroad company adds to the rate a series of charges for various services performed in connection with the transportation of the live stock, so that the shipper does not know from time to time what it will cost him to have his stock delivered at the point to which he ships it.

I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose of these shippers, and want to bring the whole subject within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and compel the carriers to state in the published tariffs the rate that must be paid by the shipper for the entire service of taking the property at the point of origin and delivering it to the point at which it is to leave the car. I think it is an amendment which will tend toward the protection of those who have occasion to use the railroads in the shipment especially of live stock.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer an amendment. I will state that it is the amendment I offered last night, which was printed and read, and about which remarks were made by myself and the chairman of the committee. I have nothing more to say about it. The chairman of the committee says he has no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, in lines 11 to 14, after the word "carriers," strike out the words "of which Federal control was relinquished prior to July 1, 1918, as provided in the act of March 21, 1918, this act shall constitute a guaranty for the said period," and insert the following: "referred to in the following provision in section 1 of the act of March 21, 1918: 'That every railroad not owned, controlled, or operated by another carrier company, and which has heretofore competed for traffic with a railroad or railroads of which the President has taken the possession, use, and control, or which connects with such railroads and is engaged as a common carrier in general transportation, shall be held and considered as within Federal control as herein defined, and necessary for the prosecution of the war, and shall be entitled to the benefit of all the provisions of this act,' and subsequently relinquished regardless of the wishes of the owners, this act shall constitute a guaranty (a) to the extent of any actual operating deficit, including taxes, that may have been incurred during the period January 1, 1918, to the date when this act takes effect; and (b) to constitute a guaranty until expiration of the four months' period heretofore provided in this section."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, there are a great many features in the bill which cover subjects that seem to be in general accord with the views of most of the Senators. I take that to be true, because there was no serious opposition to them in the committee and there seems to be none on the floor of the Senate.

The questions of dispute to a large extent narrow down to the issues involved in section 6 and the section of the bill relating to labor disputes. What I have to say at this time I intend to confine to those two sections of the bill, but I do not wish it understood that by my silence I do not approve of and am not in accord with many of the other splendid features of the bill.

It is practically impossible, of course, to write a piece of legislation that embraces so important a subject matter and covers so large a field, both in the business to which it relates and the economic problems involved, that all men can agree to. In fact, there are some few provisions in the bill that I would change if I had the sole writing of the bill. But bills of this kind are more or less a matter of compromise. We must accept the good with the bad, and, in my judgment, the very large percentage of the bill is entirely good. The few clauses that I would change are not of such grave importance that I can not accept the bill as a whole.

I feel that we must legislate on the question of railroad transportation, and legislate at a very early date, or we will endanger the entire transportation system of the country. More than a year ago the President indicated his desire to return the railroads to their owners. He has twice set the date on which he proposed to return them, unless in the meantime the Congress legislated. I do not believe that it is possible to return the railroads to their owners under present conditions and without remedial legislation, without danger to the business interests of the country. I do not mean that to be confined entirely to the railroads themselves. I have no interest in a railroad, never have had, and never expect to have. All the business interests with which I am connected are on the side of the shipper. But I realize the business from my standpoint can not be carried on unless the railroads of this country can function, unless the transportation facilities of America are prepared to carry goods that are produced in the fields and the manufactured products of the country to their ultimate market, where the producer can receive his money reward.

The policy of the regulation of railroads in the past has been correct, so far as policy is concerned. The practical workings of regulation in the past, in my judgment, have been a mistake. We have forced a condition in the supposed interest of the shipper to a point where we have reduced the problem to the successful operation of a few great systems in America, and almost to the financial destruction of 60 per cent of the American railroads. I do not mean by that that 60 per cent of the railroads are in the hands of receivers, or would have gone into the hands of receivers before the Great War came on; but I mean that 60 per cent of the roads were not functioning so that they could give the facilities that the producing and business interests along their lines were entitled to. They were not able to put in additional trackage, build additional cars, furnish facilities of all kinds, that would develop the business interests along other lines.

I think that the freights of this country should be carried at a reasonable rate; but, on the other hand, I believe that it is far more important to the shipper to have railroad facilities that will properly put him in contact with his ultimate market, and it is the question of cheap freight rates. By that I do not mean to say that freight rates ought to be exorbitant, but I think a reasonable increase in freight rates that will develop railroad facilities in this country is far better for the development of the business of the Nation than it is to have a paucity in freight rates and a lack of railroad facilities.

The purpose of drawing the bill, the basis of the bill, was to meet those conditions and conditions growing out of the war. We all recognize the fact that a dollar to-day will not purchase half the commodities that it did four years ago. That is true so far as the railroad operator is concerned, as it is so far as the man who must earn the dollar by his daily toil is concerned.

We also must recognize the fact that during the period of the war, under Government control, or at least since the period when the Adamson bill was enacted by the Congress, wages on these railroads have increased over a billion dollars.

That increase amounted to more than all the railroads have ever paid in any one year for interest on their bonds and dividends on their stocks. I know of no man who is now proposing to cut that wage scale, to reduce the wages that are paid. There is a proposal in the bill for wages that may come in the future, but as to the present wage scale I know of no proposal coming from anyone for a reduction. Without a reduction of the wage scale, the cost of the additional wage must be reflected into the cost of the transportation of freight and passengers in America.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean to indicate—and I ask for information—that the wage scale is proper, regardless of the fact that the prices of all commodities and everything else may go down very much lower than they are at the present time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not mean to indicate that the wage scale is permanent, neither to go up nor down; but I think it is a fixture for the immediate present.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I am addressing myself to. There are provisions in the bill for readjustment of the wage scale. In passing, I will say that in some particulars I do not think the wage scale was too high. The increase to the conductors and railroad engineers was only between 30 and 40 per cent. I do not think that was an extravagant increase for those men under existing conditions with the present high cost of living.

But in some other branches of the service the wage scale for some particular employees was several times in percentages greater than was granted to the engineers and conductors. I think it was an increase that was out of proportion to the increased cost of living or to the average increase in wage scales on railroads or off of them. I think the increase could have been better adjusted if it had been worked out by a board that was conversant with the facts and conditions and had properly solved the problem.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was afraid the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] may have misunderstood the remark of the Senator from Alabama. The bill does not establish any wage scale or perpetuate any wage scale. Possibly the Senator from Utah has confounded the bill with a provision found in the House bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not mean to imply that it did. I did not so understand the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. No; I did not so understand it, I will say to the Senator from Iowa. I understood that there was nothing in the bill which would perpetuate the present wage scale or prevent the board created from adjusting wage scales upon proper application.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Nothing at all. My remark merely was as to the condition of facts, that it is not probable that they will be changed at this time, and, not being changed, we have a problem to face us of a billion-dollar expenditure that was not facing the railroad management before the war.

Of course, there is the cost of coal and the cost of all other supplies, but in addition to wages and supplies there is another problem that the railroads must meet in the future which is even more difficult than this and to which they have not yet come, and that is the cost of buying money, because you have to go into the market and buy money to operate with just like you have to go into the market and buy coal to operate with and to buy labor to operate with.

Twenty years ago a railroad bond was a prime security——

Mr. THOMAS. Some of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Colorado says some of them were, and I accept the amendment; that is true, but they were so regarded as a prime security that conservative New England, through her legislative enactments, required that the funds of trustees and certain trust companies and savings banks should be invested in railroad securities because it was considered a conservative investment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Securities drawing 3 and 3½ per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. Of course, bonds were primarily the case, but even stocks at that time had a larger dividend of 4 per cent; had a ready sale on the market. The condition has entirely reversed itself. Investing capital has gone in other directions and went in other directions before the war. The great industrials were regarded as better investments and since the enactment of the income-tax law, State and county and municipal bonds have become the prime investment for conservative capital, and since that time a great issue in many billions of dollars in Government securities has flooded the market, absorbing the idle capital that is here for investment and leaving no field for investment in railroad securities.

To properly equalize the purpose of the bill I think it is absolutely necessary that we should bear the fact in mind that it is the price of money that requires the legislation. You say that the roads have many bonds out on which they are only paying 4 per cent. True; but I can also say that there are many securities of the railroads out now on which they are paying 6 and 7 and 8 per cent interest. More than that, the railroad securities in the nature of bonds that were issued in the past when railroads were a fine investment are falling due, some this year, some next year, and most of them will become due in the next decade. When they become due they must be paid. There is but one way in which the railroads can get the money to pay them, and that is to borrow. Is there any Member of the Senate optimistic enough to contend that at any time within the next decade railroad securities will again sell at par on a 4 per cent basis? I do not think so.

The price of money to-day can better be measured by a Government bond than any other security in America, because we all regard the Government bond as an absolute certainty so far as the payment of principal and interest is concerned. We know that you can go on the stock exchange to-morrow and buy a bond that is practically tax free, except for the surtax, on a 5 per cent basis. Bonds bearing 4 per cent and 4¼ per cent are selling so far below par that, measuring them by the price and the interest received, they will pay the investor 5 per cent interest at maturity with no State tax, no county tax, no municipal tax to pay, and only the surtax to pay so far as the Government is concerned.

What is that security worth as measured in terms of other securities? What is a tax exemption of that kind worth to the investor? Bear in mind that this class of securities is usually purchased by investors of large means. I take it that it would not be out of the way at all to say that the exemption from taxation is worth 1 per cent to an investor of that kind. Therefore, in comparing Government bonds with outside securities, which must pay municipal, State, county, and Government taxes, you can make the comparison that the Government bond to-day is selling on a 6 per cent basis. I do not regard that as unreasonable.

Since the bill has been before the Senate there has been some very severe criticism of it because it proposes to increase the cost of transportation, because it will increase the price the shipper must pay for transporting his freight. I am inclined to think that the statement that out of the bill will grow higher freight rates is true; but how much higher, and are they justified by the facts? I have heard it said on the floor of the Senate since the debate came on that the bill would put an ultimate charge of $4,000,000,000 on the American people. Let us come right down to facts and see what it does do.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to ask that he compare what he regards as the probable increase under the bill with what he conceives to be the inevitable increase if the bill is not passed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was coming to that. The Senator is undoubtedly correct about it.

Whether this bill passes or does not pass it will be necessary to take up the slack or the railroads can not run. They will have to be supplied with the money to function or they can not do business. The Senator is undoubtedly correct. Even if we do not pass this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Director General of Railroads must make increases to meet the increased expenditures for labor, for fuel, for the procurement of money, or the railroads can not run; they will go into the hands of receivers. Such an increase is going to come whether the bill is passed or whether it is not passed. However, the committee has tried to be liberal.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Commissioner Clark, I understand, has made an estimate that a freight increase of $1 is reflected in an increase of $5 in the cost of commodities in the hands of the ultimate consumer. Does the Senator from Alabama concur in that opinion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not informed on that subject, and that is not the question involved. Suppose it does. Now, let me ask the Senator a question. I do not know that that is so. As to how far an increase in a tariff tax will increase the article to the ultimate consumer, I do not know. That is the same proposition, and I have heard it argued, as has the Senator from Kentucky, many a day, with one side of the House contending that it meant a vast increase to the consumer and the other side arguing that it involved no increase to the consumer.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not think the charges of railroad carriers and import duties can be compared, for the reason that an import duty is usually levied on an article that goes into the hands of the consumer, while the cost of a freight rate enters into each phase of production.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So does a tariff tax.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not asking the question in a controversial sense. I am asking for information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I understand. So does the tariff tax. It starts with the raw material and goes up to the finished product. The Senator from Kentucky and I have often contended it did increase the price, whereas our friends on the other side of the House contended that it did not.

Increased freight rates are undoubtedly likely to be reflected into the pockets of the ultimate consumer to a greater amount than the actual amount of the freight rate; but there is nobody who can say to what amount. A great many men——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just a moment—theorize on that question. It depends on which side of the question you are on, as to whether you put it high or low. But nobody knows. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Alabama is correct. I have seen the statement attributed to Mr. Commissioner Clark and a similar statement, I think, was made by Mr. Commissioner Woolley. As to some articles it is possible to trace the increased cost, and it will be very much greater in the hands of the ultimate consumer; but in the case of coal and oil, which constitute 40 or 50 per cent of all of our transportation, I do not think the statement holds good at all. Upon the contrary, as to those commodities I think an increased rate enhances the cost by only a very small percentage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Utah is right. It largely depends upon the item itself. The cost of one article may be increased largely and another not materially. That, however, is not the question that confronts us. Suppose the statement which is attributed to Mr. Commissioner Clark were true and that every dollar by which railroad freight rates are increased were reflected in the pockets of the ultimate consumer of the commodity that went over the road to the extent of $5, and it were necessary to have $1 to run the railroads, would my friend from Kentucky withhold the dollar? Surely not. If it were necessary to have the dollar to run the railroads the Senator would say it is unfortunate that it has to be reflected in somebody's pocket to the extent of $5, but the railroads must function or the country can not live.

Mr. STANLEY. In the sense that a road must have an adequate rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely. That is the only question.

I have already congratulated the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on this bill. I think, taken in the main, it is a splendid and conservative bill. As to every feature I do not agree with the Senator, but I believe that it will relieve the situation.

When I first came to the Senate my friend from Iowa was regarded as a progressive; I think some people behind his back called him a radical. He has never functioned on the railroad side of this issue; he has never been a man who jumped through railroad hoops. Therefore, it rather surprised me when I found some of the Senators were practically charging him with being a tool of the railroads because he brought out this bill. The Senator from Iowa realized that there was a sick man on the table, that it required an operation to save his life; so he has gone at it in a conservative way and is trying to save the patient's life.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire, if I may, to say in that connection that my views have not been in any way changed so far as the questions referred to by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are concerned. I think we must choose now between Government ownership and operation of railroads and private ownership and operation of railroads under regulation. If we choose the latter, it is absolutely necessary to put the railways in that position which will enable them to secure the money which is necessary to operate their properties. That has been my sole guide in what influence I have had upon the construction of the pending bill.

I have not consented to give the railroads one penny more than I believed to be absolutely necessary for that purpose; and a good many members of the committee felt, I am sure, that the basis we have provided for here was rather too low than too high.

I may add with regard to Government operation that I have no doubt that Government operation continued under present law will witness a very material increase in rates. The truth is that rates are now being raised all the time. The rates which were promulgated about the middle of the year 1918, known as the 25 per cent increase in rates, which was actually an increase of more than 25 per cent, are not the only rates which have been increased since the Government began to operate the railroads. The rates have been increased here and there all the while, and I never open my mail in the morning without receiving information, and protests ordinarily, against an increase in rates made very recently.

If the railroad companies can manage their properties more economically than the Government can manage them, then there is a possibility that there need be no increase in rates; but it depends upon the economy with which the railroad companies can operate the properties and render the service as compared with the economy with which similar service can be rendered by the Government.

I beg the Senator's pardon; but I wanted to state the case exactly as it appeared from my standpoint.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad that the Senator interrupted me. I am in thorough accord with the statement of the Senator who introduced the bill. We do not want any misconception about the question of what this bill will cost the country if it is enacted into law, and it is not possible of there being a misconception.

Of course, one can theorize as to how much an increase in rates is going to magnify the cost of commodities before they reach the ultimate consumer; that is theory; but when it comes down to the practical dollars it is going to cost the country under the terms of this bill, there is not room for theory; the fact is plain; it is definitely fixed in the bill, and is not subject to controversy. I refer, of course, to the mandatory features of the bill.

So far as I know, there are but two provisions in this bill that will affect an increase in freight rates. One is the provision that authorizes one-half of 1 per cent for permanent improvements, which has heretofore been taken out of the net income of the railroads, to be taken out of the gross income of the railroads in the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That provision is not mandatory in any sense of the word but absolutely discretionary with the commission. How can any man who for the last three decades has consented to the regulation of the freight rates of this country by the Interstate Commerce Commission, where there was no limitation whatever upon the action of the commission except their own discretion in the matter, contend that there is any violent change in this bill, when the committee, to be on the safe side, renewed in the commission the power of exercising a discretion to the extent of one-half of 1 per cent, when heretofore they had the discretion with nothing to limit them but the blue dome of heaven, the reflection of the sentiment of the American people, and their own conscience as to what was right and what was wrong about the matter? Now, leaving out that, which is merely a discretion which the commission has now——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Before the Senator leaves this point, I wish to propound another question to him in the same spirit in which my last question was propounded. It has been stated repeatedly—in fact, the statement has been made to me by persons who claimed to know and who spoke from authoritative data—that not only was the rate multiplied to a startling degree but that the Government was now operating the roads at a profit and had been doing so for several months. I am not in favor of Government ownership; I am anxious to see the roads returned to their owners at the earliest possible moment; but I was surprised at such statements, not that I question them, because I have never investigated the matter and do not know; but conscious of the profound study which has been given to this question by the Senator from Alabama and having great respect for his judgment, I had hoped that he would discuss that matter before leaving this phase of the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said to the Senator before, I can not enter into a discussion with the Senator as to how many times a freight rate is multiplied before it gets into the hands of the ultimate consumer. That is purely a matter of theory.

Mr. STANLEY. I mean, does the Senator know about the relative earnings of the roads for the last several months, or does the chairman of the committee know?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama allow me to answer that question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely; I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have given it some investigation, and possibly the Senator from Alabama has not. I intended to refer to that subject when I came to reply, if I do reply, to some of the arguments which have been made against this bill.

It has been said here that during August and September and October and November—the November report is just out—the Government has made a profit, after paying the compensation provided for, in the operation of the railroads. Let us see for a moment how that profit has been ascertained.

In the first place, the cost of the general administration has not been charged to operating expenses, as I am informed. I have not, of course, gone further than simply to inquire with respect to that matter, and I have been informed that the cost of the general administration has not been charged to operating expenses. Second—and this is the real point of it—everybody who knows anything about railroads knows that the fall months—August, September, October, and November—are the money-making months in all railway operation. These are the months of great volume of traffic, and these are the months in which operation can be carried on most economically; and if you will examine the reports of the railroad companies during years past, I think you will find that their net earnings in these months have been very, very much larger than in other months of the year.

The statement that a profit has been made is arrived at in this way: The earnings of the railroad companies for these favorable months have been aggregated, and then one-twelfth of the compensation has been deducted from these earnings, with the result stated by those who have occupied the floor.

I assume that the fallacy of that kind of computation is at once observable to any student of the subject. The only way in which you can ascertain whether or not a railway is profitable in its operation is to take in the entire year, with all of its variations; and I think that when the year is over it will be found that the Railroad Administration for this year has lost more than $325,000,000.

That is my response to the Senator's question.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, at that point, does the chairman of the committee know how the earnings for these last three profitable months, for instance, that have been tabulated and given here, compare with the earnings for the same period last year? That of itself would settle the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have in course of preparation a table which will disclose the comparative earnings, and I will present it to the Senate before this debate is finished.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. KING. By way of supplementing what the Senator from Iowa has just stated, I have been informed—I do not know how credible the information is, but it comes to me from sources that I am inclined to look upon as being authentic—that the Railroad Administration, in anticipation of the roads going back to the private owners, during the last few months have curtailed necessary expenditures upon the roads for improvements and repairs and betterments and maintenance, which if made would aggregate a great many millions of dollars.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is correct about that. I do not speak by the card on that subject, but I ride on the railroads sometimes. I think it is common knowledge of everybody how much freight cars have been in demand, and it is pretty nearly common knowledge of everybody that rides on the roads how many freight cars are standing on the sidetracks to-day and can not be used because they are out of repair, and the same can be said to a certain extent of the engines of the railroads. When you stop repairing your rolling stock, and make no charges for an outlay in that respect, you certainly ought to show some pretty good earnings on the other side; but somebody has to pay the bill at some time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me, if we take into consideration the standard of compensation month by month, I think the figures will show that instead of there being a surplus for the months of September and October there has been a deficit; and I expect, later on, to present some figures sustaining that position.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am inclined to think the Senator is correct about it, although I have not worked out the figures myself. Of course, when you come to figuring, you can take an hour or a day or a minute, and sum up almost any business and prove that it is a financial success; but I am sure that it is common knowledge to every man in this Chamber that the one period of the year when a railroad ought to be making money is in the three months of the fall.

Mr. SMOOT. If it does not make money then, it is bankrupt.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; as the Senator from Utah suggests, if it does not make money then, it is bankrupt. Why? Because the crops are moving, people are traveling, there is a maximum movement of freight, and the best prices, and, more than that, there is no winter snow; there is no weather condition that makes it difficult to handle the trains. The railroad can function at its maximum in the three fall months, and ought to show its very highest condition of profit-making.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, is it not possible to determine, and has or has not the Interstate Commerce Commission determined, by a system of averages—I do not know, but I think it is vital at this point—when this apparent gain in these favorable months is such as to show an actual profit, or when it is not sufficient to bring the average up above the cost of operation for the whole year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I suppose you might theorize and figure it out, but what is the use of figuring?

Mr. STANLEY. It is not a matter of figuring. It is a matter of railroad experience, so as to know whether or not this apparent gain that is claimed is an actual gain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the Senator himself know that what they gain in October, November, and December is not going to be a gain in January, February, and March?

Mr. STANLEY. Why, certainly I know it; but I also know that if, say, the railroads in these three months have made a net profit of 20 per cent, and the averages that the Interstate Commerce Commission have kept for 20 years show that ordinarily those months sustain a 5 per cent gain over the three previous months, then such a gain as that would establish a net profit, notwithstanding they were the best months. The amount of the profit, in the light of the figures of the average that must be kept by the Interstate Commerce Commission, ought to have some meaning more than a basis of speculation to those who know more about this thing than I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure. I will say to my friend from Kentucky that I have not worked it out in that line, but if he will work it out I am sure he will find that it does not show a profit. Now, I do not know that, but I make the prediction that he can not work out any profit if he will take it for the year. The reason why I know there has not been a profit is because you can take the whole year—it is practically out now—and demonstrate that they have made a very great loss. Now, what is the use of our theorizing that in the three good months they made a profit, when we know that they have made a great loss during the year, and more than that, we know it because it is reflected in the bills in this Congress?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not wish to take the other side of this controversy with the Senator; but I think the question is pertinent, nevertheless, for this reason: It is claimed by those who use this profit as an argument—and I am not taking that position at all—that the previous months were either months of war or months in which they were recovering from the shock of that controversy, and that this profit is not due to the normal movement of freight, but is due to a return to normal by the railroads. I do not make any such claim as that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The war was over a year before we reached this period. More than that, the conditions that I see in the railroads are no more normal this fall than they were last spring. It is a pure theory that is worked up by men who want to close their eyes to fact. The fact is that they have lost money, and the fact is that they stood at the door of Congress, when the long session of the last Congress was dying, proclaiming to us that if we did not pass a money bill for their relief then and there they could not function.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand, the war was not over a year before the beginning of the period when it is claimed these roads were making a profit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The war was over on the 11th day of November, and I understood that they were taking——

Mr. STANLEY. It has been stated on the floor of the Senate, and has been stated elsewhere, that they claim a profit for September and October.

Mr. CUMMINS. One year before, however. The war was over the 11th of November, 1918. The three months which have been mentioned here are the three months in the fall of 1919.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure; nearly a year, if not a year, before it was over.

Mr. STANLEY. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the Senator, as I understood him, stated that the war was over for a year before these figures were made. Now, I do not understand that that is exactly accurate with reference to those months, and the question was with reference to those months.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will correct my statement, then, and say it was over for practically a year.

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; that is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, there is not any question about it; the reason why men bring that kind of an argument before the Senate is because they have to depend on theory to support their case and have to ignore facts. The fact is, and everybody knows the fact, that these railroads have been losing money, if you take the year through, and have not been making money, and they will go back to losing it when we get into the winter months of January, February, and March. There will be no better condition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Conceding that, and I do not see how it can be successfully disputed, is not this a very unwise time to turn the roads back?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That depends on the point of view from which you want to look at it. Before they were taken over by the Government some way or somehow they were run with less freight rates than they are running with now, with less passenger rates than they are running with now, and they were giving more efficient service to the people of the United States than they are giving now. Whose fault that is, I do not know. It may be no human being's fault. It may be the fault of conditions; but nevertheless it is a fact.

The question may be asked as to whether if we turn them back to their owners they will give better service. I do not expect cheaper freights, because whilst the Government has had them they put burdens on them that must be reflected in the freight rates, and it would be folly to contend that they could. I believe myself that they will give better service, because, I do not care how much ability a man has—he may be a superman—there is no one man with sufficient ability to sit in Washington and issue his orders and make all the railroads throughout the United States function as successfully as they could do under presidents, general managers, and boards of directors who were interested in the property and had a specific line of road under their observation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I agree with the Senator in that. This is the only point I had in mind: Granting the efficiency with private energy, initiative, and so forth, in which I agree fully with the Senator, yet if we put the roads back under such conditions that they would have burdens that they can not bear, I am afraid they will fall down; whereas if we turn them over to the owners, say, the 1st of September, when, with the energy and efficiency they could manifest they would probably bring us in greater receipts than we get under Government enterprise, they would have a chance to go on. Now, it looks to me as if we are likely to turn them back with such a tremendous burden, and probably such a tremendous deficit, that with all their energy and all their efficiency they can not stand up under it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I do not think the bill is any too liberal to them; but the purpose in writing the bill, and the effort of the committee, was to make it liberal enough to take care of the situation which the Senator has just visualized. That was the purpose of the bill, and that is what we are driving at, to meet the very condition the Senator has described.

We do not make this condition permanent. It has been said here that we are writing a freight rate and charge on the public forever, never to come off. The bill itself denies that. The basis of making rates in the bill is fixed for five years, to enable the railroads to get the money to carry over the situation the Senator has described, and at the end of five years the whole question of the making of rates goes back to the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, exactly where it rests to-day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, what I am really trying to get is the view of the Senator as to whether it would not be wiser for us not to try to pass any legislation at all, and not have the railroads turned back to their owners until, say, about the 1st of September?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a matter, of course, of judgment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I just wanted the Senator's opinion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not contend that my judgment is better than that of other men. It is really a matter of judgment. I do not know anybody to pass on it. I will tell you what influences my judgment, to a large extent, in wanting to see them turned back at once. It is that they have been a charge on the Treasury of the United States of $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year ever since we have had them. I do not mean to include in that the money we have advanced, and which we hope to get back some day, which amounts to something like $1,000,000,000; but I am talking of an actual charge on the Treasury of $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year ever since we have had them. If they are going to be controlled by private owners, if the future policy is going to be to turn them back to private owners, and that is what I am in favor of doing, then I do not see why we should continue the burden on the American public of $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year for another year. I think we had better turn them back right now.

You may say that if we do not turn them back, and do not take it out of the Treasury, we have to take it out of the freight rates. That is probably true. But the man who pays the freight gets something in return, and the man who does not have any freight to carry bears the burden without any adequate return; and I think if anybody must pay the increased cost of the operation of the railroads it ought to be the man whose freight is hauled and who gets an adequate return.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator states that he expects, and we all expect, that under the bill freight rates will be increased as soon as the roads are returned to private ownership. The Senator speaks of a great deficit being constantly created through Federal operation. I want to ask the Senator why it is not just as competent for the Railroad Administration to increase freight rates while the roads are under Federal control, and thus relieve the Treasury, as it is for the railroads under private ownership to do so?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it undoubtedly is, and though I am not speaking with authority, but am just voicing my own opinion, I think if Congress would declare a permanent policy of continued control by the Government, the Railroad Administration would increase freight rates. They would be compelled to do it, and they would do it. But expecting that the roads will be turned back to their owners in January, it is very natural that the administration would try to work through the present condition without an increase in freight rates.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] suggested next September as the date. I think that it might be before that, but if a time six months in the future were fixed, could not the present Railroad Administration increase the rates and thus protect the Treasury?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly it could. But why should we put it off for 6 months instead of 30 days? I can see no reason. We are attempting to put them into a condition, under this bill, where they can function. If we are going to return the roads to the owners, I can see no reason in the world for postponing action for six months, and not doing it now. Nothing appeals to me in the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator recognize that the task of unscrambling and readjusting the roads is going to be a very great task, indeed, and that it would be very much easier to do it if the roads were returned in April or May or later, when there would be normal business, when the executives would not have to devote their entire attention to the operation of the roads and saving deficits, so far as possible?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is purely theoretical. The man who devotes his time to operation is one man, the man who devotes his attention to finance is another man, and the man who is going to devote his time to operation will not be concerned or interfere with the financial questions.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I was not referring to financial questions, but the very operation itself, the use of terminal facilities, and the routing of freight. The railroads are now being run as a unified system. It is a matter of operation and not of finance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as the question of freight is concerned, I do not know any time when the hauling of freight is lighter than in the winter months. It certainly is much lighter than at many other times of the year, and if you want to turn the roads back at a convenient time from that standpoint, it is easier to handle now, and it seems to be now would be the time.

But that is not the real question. I know perfectly well that there is a sentiment in this country not to turn the railroads back to the owners, and I know perfectly well that there is a strong sentiment in favor of their return. The man who does not want the railroads to be returned to their owners naturally wants to put it off for an hour or a day or a year or a decade, if he can, and the man who wants to get them off the back of the Treasury of the United States and get them back into the hands of the owners wants it done the first moment he can get it done. We understand that proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not put some of us, who believe it would be better to postpone the turning back for three or four months, among those who are against returning them at all. I certainly am not one.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want my remarks to apply to the Senator from Wisconsin at all, but I am talking about the men who do not want them returned at all, who want Government ownership. Of course they welcome the hour of delay, just as the man who occupies my position, who believes that they should go back to the private owners, wants them to go there as soon as it can be done.

But I have gotten far afield from the real question that I wanted to call to the attention of the Senate. The charge has been made that if we return these roads to their owners we are going to put a great burden on the American people under the terms of the bill. As I said, this is not a question of guess, it is not a question of theory; it is a question of abstract fact. We allow one-half of 1 per cent, in the discretion of the commission, to be used for the payment of unproductive improvements, and if the commission desires to use that discretion in the future it may do so; but it has the discretion now to increase rates without limit. So that is merely a discretionary matter and can be dismissed as part of the permanent charge. They will probably have to do it; but if you do not pass this bill they will probably have to increase the freight rates.

But what does the bill do? In the period just before the war—and I will say in passing it was a very good period for the railroads—under the freight rates that were established by the commission, reflecting the views of the Congress of the United States, on the average, for the period of three years, the railroads of the country earned on the value of their property, as shown by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, 5.22 per cent. I think my figures are correct. I will ask the chairman of the committee to correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. The statement just made is correct, as I remember it. The only suggestion I make is that this earning of 5.22 per cent was upon the property investment account.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The property investment account as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Interstate Commerce Commission has never fixed it. It is property investment account as reported by the various railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will make this correction in my statement, that the property investment account since 1906 has been made according to the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before that it was carried on the books and made by the railroads themselves. The railroads have nearly doubled in value since 1906—I mean in their property investment accounts—so that that part we know is correct. The part prior to that in some instances may reflect some watered stock, but in other instances it reflects a great increase in value. I have heard it said by members of the commission that, not in detail but as a whole, the investment account practically reflects the real value of the railroads as it would be ascertained.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand the Senator from Alabama, if the total capitalizations of the railroads of the United States were sold at par they would reproduce the properties upon which they are based at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I did not make any statement of that kind. I do not know about that.

Mr. STANLEY. The property investment account, I understand, is practically the same as the total capitalization. I should like to ask that question of the chairman of the committee, if the Senator does not know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I should like not to be diverted from what I am saying at this time.

The property investment account, I have understood from the commission, practically represents as a whole the real value of the property. Some roads have it too high and some too low, but when you take it for all of the railroads of the United States it is about a real reflection of value. On that they earned for the three years of the test period 5.22 per cent. What does the bill give them? The bill gives them 5.5 per cent on the value of the property as fixed by the commission—not fixed by the railroads, not fixed by the Congress, but fixed by the commission. I take it that that is a substantial and fair comparison of the increase, and there is no other increase. It is all right there.

The difference between 5.22 for the three years preceding the war and 5.5 that is reflected in the bill is 0.28 per cent. I do not know how you would fix the value of the railroad properties; you can fix it yourselves. Some men say they are worth $17,000,000,000, some $18,000,000,000, some more than that, some less than that, but I believe it is generally taken by the commission that $18,000,000,000 reflects their book value. If the charges for freight rates are going to be less, they certainly are not going to be higher than their own book value, and the commission fixing it at 0.28 figured on $18,000,000,000 of value means $50,400,000.

Mr. STANLEY. Do I understand the Senator to state that the commission fixed the value of the railroads?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; under the bill.

Mr. STANLEY. I mean the value as ascertained by the railroads upon the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not understand my friend from Kentucky. The bill bases the rate-making basis of 5½ per cent on the value of the railroads, which is to be fixed by the commission. That is provided in the bill.

Mr. STANLEY. I understood the Senator from Alabama to refer to the present value of the railroads and their past earnings. I do not understand that that value was fixed by the commission, but it was fixed by the railroads under a system of bookkeeping prescribed by the commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely. The values before 1906 were fixed by the railroads absolutely. Since 1906 they have been fixed by the railroads under the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was practically the making of them by the commission. The value ascertained, if I recollect aright, was something like $18,000,000,000. I say, it is reasonable to assume that the commission is not going above that amount in fixing the value.

The Senator may contend that their value is less than $18,000,000,000. Then their earning capacity under the bill will be less, and possibly there will not be any increase at all in the amount of freight rates. But assuming that the value of $18,000,000,000 in the three-year test period was correct and their earning capacity was 5.22 per cent, and assuming that the commission is not going to put the value above that when they fix the value, and that that is going to be the extreme limit, then their increased earning capacity under the bill above what it would have been before the war for the three test years is 0.28 per cent, or, reflected into dollars, is $50,400,000. All this talk about a $4,000,000,000 charge upon the American people, all this talk about a tremendous increase in freight rates under the bill, is mere smoke, a smoke cloud blown by the enemy to conceal its own operations.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator means to say that whatever the increase for the freight of the entire country would be, it would be a percentage which in the aggregate would bring about $50,000,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As fixed by the 5½ per cent.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As fixed by the 0.28 per cent, the difference between what they earned previous to being taken over by the Government and what they would earn under the percentage on the invested value.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly, except that, as I said before, and I am not sure the Senator from South Carolina was here when I said it, there is a discretion in the commission to allow them to charge to gross account one-half of 1 per cent for nonproductive improvements that heretofore were charged to net account. If the commission allows that, that would reflect into the return an additional one-half of 1 per cent. That, however, is discretionary with the commission. It is not in the bill. It is put in there to take care of an emergency if the emergency arises.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks that under the bill the commission, in fixing the value of the property, which it is empowered to do under the bill, would take into consideration the changed conditions as to the value of property in general, and in fixing the value would they or would they not be justified in raising the value of the property now owned somewhat in ratio to the increased value of other earning properties not railroad?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course I can not predict what the commission is going to do. We know what it has done in fixing values in the past. They say they are largely through with their work, at least three-fourths through, and they have not reflected any such viewpoint in their present work. What they might do in the future I can not predict, but up to this time in their work in ascertaining the value of the railroads they have not reflected a viewpoint that would give an increased property charge along the line suggested by the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state the reason why I asked the question. The railroads previous to being taken over by the Government earned a certain average out of that 5.22 which we bound ourselves under the transfer of the railroads to the Government to make good. It aggregated something like a billion dollars in round numbers. What is the Senator's opinion, with the increased cost of wages, with the increased expenses that have been incurred by the Government and fixed by the Government, as to whether when we return them the $50,000,000 additional will enable the railroads to meet the responsibilities of increased wages and their increased charges? How will they live?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I doubt whether it would, I will say to the Senator, if it were not for the fact that there is one-half of 1 per cent in addition to the 5½ per cent that is discretionary with the commission and that they can charge to gross account instead of to net account, which amounts to their increasing the compensation one-half of 1 per cent. I think that would take care of the situation, but if that is not necessary they do not have to do it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My experience in looking over the details that I have been able to get from the administration and comparing the expense accounts as best I could with the expense previously to the railroads being taken over by the Government leads me to ask this question. I know the Senator is inclined, if he will allow this digression, as all the balance of us are, to the idea that the railroads must go back, but is there any doubt that for a considerable period the one-half of 1 per cent, representing the difference between 6 per cent and 5½ per cent, plus the other one-half of 1 per cent, will be used to meet the conditions?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That would only be a guess on my part, and it is not worth any more than a guess. I am rather inclined to think the guess of the Senator from South Carolina is correct. I suppose it is only a guess on his part.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is a little more than a guess for the reason I shall state. The railroads have an earning of 5.22 previous to the war on their property with the increased wages; and we must not forget that there was a 25 per cent increase in freight and in passenger rates made by the Government, in spite of the enormous tonnage incident to the period, the motive power and the rolling stock being taxed to its utmost, the tonnage carried per ton-mile in the country for the period of the last four years having been the greatest in its history, in spite of the 25 per cent increase on all classified freight and something like perhaps 150 to 200 per cent on some special commodities, and in spite of a 33 per cent raise in passenger rates, leaves a deficit of something like $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 between the operating expenses and the operating income.

Taking those circumstances into consideration and allowing for the incapacity of new hands to run the old roads as efficiently as they were run in the hands of their masters, it is not reasonable to suppose that if they could only earn 5.22 per cent before the war and to now only increase it one-half of 1 per cent to meet these enormous additional burdens, even the one-half of 1 per cent is going to take care of the situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is correct about that. I believe that under the terms of the bill the railroads can go back and function. What I am addressing myself to is the charge that we are putting an unnecessary burden on the American people in the cost of shipping freight. I do not think there is any Senator who will stand on the floor on either side, no matter what his attitude is with reference to the bill, and insist that we should cut down wages to meet the situation. We know that they can not cut down the cost of the purchase of their supplies, because nobody else can cut that down. We know they can not cut down the price of money, because they have the great Government of the United States of America with its bonds competing with them in the money market. So I think when Senators advance the argument that this bill ought not to be passed because it is putting a great burden on the American people, there is no man who can come down to the facts embraced within the leaves of this bill and sustain any such position.

If that argument is not sound, and if the basis of rate making is reasonable and imposes only a reasonable charge on the American public, what is the objection to the bill? It is new; it is something novel. Of course, that is an objection to the bill; it is an objection in the mind of every man. We like to walk out before the public, throw out our chests, and say that we are progressive, that our neighbors are reactionary. That is modern thought, modern style; but, nevertheless, it may be stated as a fact that no man comes out with a new proposition in relation to anything that objection to it is not raised until a large number of the people are convinced that it is right and that it ought to be adopted, whether it is right or wrong. Then a propaganda may be inaugurated behind it that will do something in its favor. It then becomes progressive. Any new idea, however, until it reaches that stage of hatching is reactionary. To men of that mind who have not analyzed the bill there is an objection to section 6, and one objection only, and that is that it provides an absolutely new basis for rate making. Why is that necessary? It is new, and I recognize the fact that it can be properly challenged because it is new, for if a change is going to be made a reason should be given for the change, and it should be shown that the change will produce results for the good and not for the bad.

The reason for this change is simple. The old system broke down. There is not a man in America who can deny the fact that the old system of rate making would not work; it would not function. There could not be a schedule of rates arranged under the old system that did not either pay one road too much or another road too little. Under the old system of rate making great earning capacity was given to a few roads in this country, and the remainder of them were left hanging by their eyelids, ready to drop into the hands of a receiver at any moment. That was because the country was divided into three great rate-making districts, and all the railroads in the country had to be measured by the standard of one or the other of those districts. If a system of rate making were adopted by which road A was allowed to make enormous dividends in order that road B might barely live, there was a cry against it, and it was said that it was exploiting the public, and the rate had to be reduced. When the rate was reduced on road A it had to be reduced at the same time on road B, because the rate had to be uniform, and road B went into bankruptcy. If that had merely involved the loss of money which had been invested in the road by its stockholders, it would have been bad, although it might be said the public was not interested in that contingency, but the real proposition was, Had not the man who lived on road B as much right to transportation facilities to carry his products to the final market of consumption as the man who lived on road A? It is not a question of the ownership of the stock; it is not a question that applies to the individuals who are engaged in the railroad business; but it is a question of the right of the citizens of the United States to have transportation facilities to the ultimate market.

The Congress of the United States is not living up to the responsibilities that rest on it unless it be willing to write legislation on the statute books that will enable the weak road to function for the benefit of the clientele that lives along its line as well as enable the strong road to operate. Why should a man who has a factory or a farm on the Pennsylvania Railroad have in the eyes of the law a better right to carry his products to the ultimate market of consumption than the man who lives on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad? Yet the fact is that 80 per cent of the freight and passenger returns that maintain the railroads is obtained from the long haul, and that only 20 per cent of it comes from the short haul.

In the case of competitive lines, whether or not the rate is fixed by law, both roads have got to carry the freight at the same price, or all the freight travels along the line of the road that carries it the cheapest. We long ago recognized the fact that it was not possible to establish a freight rate that would afford reasonable compensation to a weak road and a lesser freight rate that would be reasonable compensation to a strong road and then have the weak road charge the higher rate and do business; that was found to be impossible. For the competitive distance the weak road had to haul the freight at the same price as the strong road, or it could not do the business.

The result is apparent in the tendency to take the more prosperous roads, make comparison of their earning capacity, establish freight rates on that basis, and then leave the future of the weak roads to be worked out as best it could, with the consequence that there has been a continuous procession of the railroads of America going into the hands of receivers, and there has been a continual complaint by the shippers of this country that they could not get the car facilities necessary to the conduct of their business.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, is it exactly stating the whole facts in the case as to the weak road and the strong road to say that, by establishing a rate that would enable the strong road to earn a dividend out of all reason on the capital invested, the weak road on the same rate would scarcely be able to live? Was the fault entirely with the rate, or was it not largely due—I do not know to what extent—to the power of certain strong companies, outside of the personal direction of the freight on the part of the shipper, to sell their tonnage to other strong roads, divert traffic where they pleased, and thus deny an equitable division of the traffic of the country that would enable the so-called weak roads to exist under the rate that had been established?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator's statement is correct to a certain extent; there is no doubt that certain strong roads, while not directly pooling, could deliver their freight to certain other strong roads, and in that way build up a business that was detrimental to the weaker roads. That is probably especially true of what is called short-line railroads. But that was only a part of the equation. It was partially responsible for the evils complained of, but the main cause was that the weaker roads did not have a sufficient freight and passenger rate to sustain them. As to the matter of which the Senator speaks, this bill endeavors to correct that trouble and, in my judgment, does correct it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I made the suggestion because of the argument that we were attempting now to base the rate structure on the aggregate value invested within a rate district rather than on what is termed a reasonable return upon the property invested, which is another way of saying the same thing, the only difference being the basis of calculation. If within a given community the Interstate Commerce Commission were given the power at certain terminal points to distribute the tonnage, would it not largely obviate the necessity under which we have heretofore rested of legislating from time to time to cure these inequalities?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it was practicable to do so under the old system.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think it was impossible, and therefore I am saying, in commendation of those features of the bill, that making the rates uniform was absolutely misleading and destructive unless there were some way provided of equitably distributing the tonnage so as to give the same basis of earnings to roads operating within a given district.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is necessary, and that is covered by this bill. I agree with the Senator about the necessity for an equitable distribution of the traffic. I take it that the primary point that we are after, and that every Senator here should be after, is service to the public. That is the question that we should meet—service to the public. Of course, the people who have money invested in this property should have their property taken care of. I am not one of those who believe for a moment in confiscating another man's property. I do not believe in doing it by freight rates or by any other method, but I do not contend that that is the primary object of this bill. The question of the value of this property to the owners is a secondary consideration in the great problem that is confronting us to solve to-day, that of seeing that the American shipping public have carriers of freight and passengers at their doors that can properly serve them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not think it will divert the Senator, but right at that point I want to ask him what remedy he would suggest, because it must be provided for in this bill now or later? This bill is predicated upon a standardized condition in this country, upon the idea that we are going to divide it up into certain rate-making groups, take the value of the property within each of those groups, and then upon that value allow the roads within a given group to earn 6 per cent on the aggregate property there. What provision is made for the building of new railroads in undeveloped territory?

The Senator recognizes, as I recognize, that this country is not standardized, and that there are communities into and through which railroads should be built that are not developed that could not furnish sufficient tonnage to live on anything like the standard return that is now provided for, and the overhead charge, the necessary expenses incurred in its production, would have to be taken care of unless the railroads that own the lines contiguous to that country laid aside a sufficient surplus out of the earnings above the 5½ per cent to build the road and still be under the rate of 5½ per cent. That means that new railroad construction in this country ceases with the passage of this bill unless some provision is made now to take care of new ventures until they can absorb the overhead charges incurred in construction.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am in accord with the view of the Senator about developing new lines of railroad in undeveloped territory. In certain portions of the East and the Middle West, probably, that is not necessary, but, undoubtedly, in portions of the South and far West the development of new lines of railroad is necessary and should be encouraged. I will say to the Senator, however, that the section I am now discussing, section 6, in no way militates against that, and the new scheme of fixing railroad rates does not militate against that, because the present rate that is being fixed in this bill is at least twenty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent greater than they earned before.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, yes; that is all right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So there is nothing here that would militate against that. Now, at the end of the five years in which this 5½ per cent rate is fixed it goes back to the discretion of the commission to fix the basis of the rates, just where it stands to-day.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So that it is impossible for anything in section 6 to militate against the building of new roads. There may be something elsewhere in this bill that may militate against that.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; but what I was speaking of was this: Within five years this basis will operate, but my idea was—and I do not know but that we may find that that is a fairer basis—that if the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the power granted in this bill, will scrutinize the securities, the real property devoted to the public use, and will restrict the roads issuing these securities or investing the money to the use of that money on their own individual property and carry out the purposes of this bill, it is my opinion now that this is perhaps a fairer basis of calculating what a uniform rate would be than any other that possibly may be found. Now, of course, I am not committing myself to the diversion of the excess to other purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But I am saying that it is my opinion that the initial method will be found to be more equitable and just. If that be true, then it will be perpetuated; and I take it that we are now legislating, perhaps, more with the idea of standardization, of fixity, in our minds than that we are yet in the crescent period, in the developing period; and that while we are legislating to bring about an adequate service to the public that are now supplied with railroads we must not lose sight of an incentive to still further construct railroads and develop this country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator thoroughly; but there is nothing in section 6, the new basis of rate making, that affects that question at all. If there is anything in this bill that can affect it, it is those provisions of the bill which relate to Government supervision of the issuance of railroad securities.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I beg the Senator's pardon. Is he discussing section 6 alone, without reference to the general provisions of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I am glad to answer questions on the other point, but the matter that I was particularly discussing at this time was section 6. Of course, however, I recognize the fact that probably the great railroads of the West were built, and could only be built, from a speculative standpoint. They have been condemned many times, and are to-day, on the floor of the Senate, because they sold their bonds and then gave a share of stock with each of the bonds. However, they were going through an undeveloped prairie or a trackless forest. There was nothing there to develop business. The man who put his money into them was not willing to do it on a 6 per cent basis or a 7 per cent basis, because he could get that by lending it on safe mortgages at home. It had to be a speculative venture, or you would not have gotten the money, and they did speculate. The investor in those roads got $2 of securities for $1 of cash, and he went in and built up a great empire, put towns and cities in it, and mines and factories and great consuming populations, because he was ready to make the speculation.

That was all right in a primitive country, in a developing country; but the people of the United States have passed beyond that. They say to-day: "We are not willing for men to speculate in that way in the securities of the common carriers that must give us our outlet to the markets, and put their charge on us. We want a dollar invested to be accounted for as a dollar, and we do not want to pay freight returns on anything more than the dollar actually invested."

That is the sentiment of to-day. It is the sentiment I am in accord with to-day, without criticizing the speculative building of the railroads of the past.

Of course, this bill has within its leaves a Government supervision of the future issue of railroad securities. How far that may go to prevent and to interfere with the speculative development of railroads in new territory I can not say, but the laws must be uniform. We can not eat our pie and keep it, too. We have got to take one horn or the other of the dilemma; and I do not think there is any question that the country as a whole wants, from now on, a definite understanding as to what it costs to develop a railroad, how the dollars are expended, and whether or not its freight rates must bear the burden of watered stock.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand; but the Senator would not pretend to say that the demand in the standardized sections of our country for uniformity would preclude the possibility of independent communities, not attached to any railroad system now, building a railroad, incurring overhead charges, furnishing this convenience to an undeveloped community, and being given exceptional privileges in those particular cases to bring that community ultimately into accord with the developed condition of other communities?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so; but, of course, that will be a question for the future, because, whether this bill passes or some other bill passes, a bill is going to pass the Congress regulating the issuance of railroad securities. The Senator from South Carolina knows that as well as I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, I understand that; but no provision whatever is made in this bill that I can find, except an amendment that was put in the other evening by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], taking care of this feature in a limited way. It goes without saying, however, that whenever you restrict the railroads to an earning based upon standardization and tonnage plus the capital invested, as in the case of the old railroads, and then put into the hands of a Federal authority the right to say where, how, and when railroads shall be built, if this becomes the fixed policy of this Government it is the end of railroad construction, except as feeders to lines where necessity compels them to be built, so far as the United States is concerned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Assuming, as I did a moment ago, that either this bill or some other bill regulating the issuance of railroad securities is going shortly to pass Congress—and I suppose that if any man were so bold as to move to strike those pages from this bill, there is no probability that he would get any vote but his own, because there is a fixed sentiment that the Government should regulate the issuance of railroad securities——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me. I think that of all the provisions in the bill, this provision that empowers the commission to scrutinize and determine the character of railroad securities is the most-needed one. Had that been passed years ago and religiously observed, certain abuses that have brought about a condition in the railroads that we are now complaining of never would have existed. Railroads have been wrecked, as the Senator knows, because of the issuance of fictitious stock. I think that is essential; but I think we ought to write into the law a broad provision in reference to the building of new roads.

Let the securities be passed upon by the commission, but grant the power to take care of the overhead charges after the roads are constructed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from South Carolina that if there is any provision or amendment that he can write to this bill that will not destroy Government supervision of railroad securities and yet will encourage the building of roads in new territory at the same time, I shall be glad to support it. I just have not the ability myself to put it on paper. I do not see the way. But if such an amendment can be offered, I will be glad to support it. And I am not controverting his views. But all I say is that the only provisions in this bill that are affirmatively against the development of a new railroad system, or that could be construed that way, are the provisions that require Government supervision of the issuance of securities, about which the Senator and I agree that there probably would not be a vote in the Senate cast against them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I think not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all there is to it. No man can contend for a minute that the provisions of section 6, fixing compensation, make it more difficult for the building of new railroads, because section 6 provides for a further increase, not so very much greater, but for a greater increase in returns on stock than has ever been made before, and I think with a new basis of rate making, placing it on their return on value, instead of primarily on service that ultimately must be reflected in value; and as an evidence that the Congress of the United States is willing to try and do what is fair by these railroad systems I think the passage of this bill will have a strong tendency to encourage the investor, and a very much stronger tendency than anything that has occurred in the last decade, to put his money into the development of new lines of road in new territory where there is a chance for a reasonably profitable return.

I see nothing in this bill whatever that would militate against the development of new roads as compared to present conditions if you admit that the provisions in reference to the issuance and supervision of securities by the Government are going to become law, because that is all there is to it. Of course, that takes out the speculative feature, the watered-stock feature, and brings it down to the solid basis that a dollar invested means a dollar to go into the railroads, and only a dollar must earn interest and be paid by the shipper of freight. So that I see nothing in that.

Now, as to dividing the country into districts in rate making, it is divided now. The rates of this country are based in three separate districts. Under the terms of this bill the rate making will be in three separate districts, following the geographical lines as they are to-day. The question is simple; it is accurate. The investor will know what he is going to get. The man who ships his freight will know what he is going to pay.

Mr. STANLEY. Let me ask the Senator, Does the bill provide for more than three districts or zones as a basis for rate making?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is all for rate making. There are some features about consolidation of railroads that divide it up into 35 or more systems; but that has nothing to do with the rate making.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The bill does not provide for any rate-making groups, except the divisions which you speak of for consolidation. So there will be between 20 and 35.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. Section 6 provides that—

> In dividing the country into districts and the carriers into rate-making groups the commission shall have in view the similarity of transportaton and traffic conditions therein. Rates of transportation shall at all times be just and reasonable and sufficient to produce a reasonable return upon the aggregate value of the property in each rate group used or held for the service of transportation.

As I understand the bill, it contemplates that the commission shall establish three rate-making districts.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As the Senator knows, on account of conditions over which I had no control, I could not be present during the discussion of the bill by the full committee. But I have not seen anything in the bill that indicates any rate-making groups, outside of the consolidation groups provided for. I think the Senator will find, by a study of the bill, that it makes the rate making and the consolidation coterminous.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not so understand the bill. I can not put my finger on the provision now, but I think the consolidation groups have nothing to do with rate making. The commission is to establish these rate-making groups in three zones. But that is not very material, because that could be changed. That is a mere detail.

But here is the change. To-day there is a southern rate-making group, which embraces the territory in which the Senator from South Carolina and myself reside. The rates are made up not on the value of the property directly but what is a just and reasonable return for the service rendered. That is reflected in so many cents per pound for the shipment of cotton, so much for the shipment of iron, so much for the shipment of the other products in our southern district. But in the end it must reflect itself in dollars, because it must be just and reasonable. What does that mean? Reasonable to the shipper and just to the railroad. What is just to the railroad? It means an earning capacity sufficient on its capital investment and its expenditures to reflect a reasonable return on the value of its property.

But you leave that problem uncertain as to what is going to be a fair return. You guess at it in freight rates as to what is going to be a reasonable return on the property. You guess at it in establishing a freight-rate-making system, and that guess is being attacked by the shipper, who wants to pull it down, and by the railroad manager, who wants to pull it up.

This bill abandons that system. It simply provides for 5½ per cent interest for the next five years on the value of the property. There is no watered stock in this proposition, no uncertain securities. In fixing the rate basis in this bill, it does not make a particle of difference to the public whether the railroad has had watered stock in the past or whether it waters the stock in the future, because the bill has nothing to do with stock and stock values. It is the real value of the property that is considered; and the bill says that upon the value of that property the owners for the next five years shall be entitled to a return of 5½ per cent. That is all there is to it, 5½ per cent, which I say no man in this day and time can say is an unreasonable return. At the end of five years the same discretion will be exercised by the commission, to fix what is a reasonable return upon the value of the property, that is now exercised by them to fix what shall be a reasonable return upon the value of the service rendered, and it is only a question as to whether it is more equitable and just and reasonable to fix the compensation upon the value of the property, and recognize that in the beginning, than to try and reach what is equitable and just on the property by taking a particular rate.

I can see no reasonable objection to the acceptance of section 6. On the other hand, I believe that section 6 will enable the railroads of this country to be placed on a more stable financial basis, will enable them to sell their securities so that they can get the money to pay back what they owe the Government, and sell their securities so that they can make the betterments and improvements that are necessary to serve the public.

We must not overlook the fact that these railroads owe the Government of the United States $1,000,000,000, and that to pay it back to the Government would reduce the taxation ultimately to that extent. They have no way of paying it back except to earn the money in freight rates or to sell their securities; and, of course, you could not put a freight-rate charge of $1,000,000,000 on these railroads now and make them return the money at once. So that the only way for the Government to get back its money is in the sale of securities by these corporations.

I believe that this bill will stabilize these securities, will enable them to place them on the market and sell them, so that they can get the money to pay the Government, and also enable them to get money to make the new developments, to build double tracks where double tracks are needed, and to buy additional cars where more car facilities are needed by the public.

There is no objection to section 6 that I have heard on the other end of the line. The bill fixes the basis of the intake the charge on the public for freight rates as based on 5½ per cent on the value of the property. But it does not limit the earnings of the railroads to 5½ per cent. That does not mean that all the railroads in America are going to earn 5½ per cent, not by any means; or that they are going to get 5½ per cent, not by any means, because they have to earn it before they get it, just as they do now. The 5½ per cent is merely a basis for fixing the rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission must fix as the basis of their rates an amount that, as near as may be, will reflect 5½ per cent return on the value of the property. But if a railroad can not carry freight and passengers and can not do a business economically sufficient to earn it, it can not earn the 5½ per cent; and, as a matter of fact, most of them will not do so.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator if he had made a study—and I presume he has—of the different values placed upon the railroads throughout the country. Take them down on the coastal plain, where there is scarcely any grading and where conditions of cheap building exist. The capitalization necessarily is less than for roads that run at right angles to the coast and intersect our mountain country.

The cost per mile in different parts of the United States varies as geographical conditions vary. Under this provision, where the road has cost enormously more than other roads, would not the freight necessarily in that section be out of all joint with the freight under this iron-clad rule in the section where the roads cost less?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It ought to be, but it can not be where it is competitive, because the other road can not increase its freight rates above those of its competitors.

I think the bill has a provision in it that will aid that situation where it is not a competitive road. There are railroads that build into mountain territories at great expense, without a great volume of freight to be handled, where it is very much cheaper for the people who live in that territory to have the railroad at even a higher rate of freight than it is to wagon their produce over the mountains. People of that kind could well afford to pay, and it would be cheaper for them to pay double the freight rate that is paid in other sections of the country and they would be greatly benefited by so doing.

That can be done under the bill in the discretion of the commission in the adjustment of freight rates to a large extent where the commission desires to exercise that discretion, and it may be helpful especially in the case of the short-line railroads. But it is impossible to do it where there is competition. It is not done to-day where there is competition. A road that goes over the mountains and has the long haul and the difficult way of getting to market, the costly carriage, does not want a freight rate fixed that is commensurate with the service rendered when it is competing with a railroad which runs over a shorter line, through valleys, at less cost of building and cost of actual transportation, because if it had it the other railroad would get all the freight, as I said awhile ago, and the road, of course, would be put out of business. It would not carry any of the through freight. However, I think the bill within its provisions carries, as far as is possible to do so, the discretion to the commission to relieve the situation referred to by the Senator from South Carolina.

There is another provision that I wish to discuss, and that is the pay of the railroads. The bill allows a railroad to earn up to 6 per cent. Then, if it earns more than that, out of what it earns between 6 and 7 per cent it can retain one-half of 1 per cent, and above 7 per cent it can retain one-fourth of 1 per cent of all it makes.

Some have asked why should you limit the earning capacity of the railroads? That same question was asked 30 or 40 years ago—most of us were boys at the time—when the original bill was passed to allow a commission to regulate the freight rates charged by the railroads of America. The men who owned the railroads in that day said, "Why, this is our private property. The Government has not any right to step in here and say what we shall charge for the carriage of persons and property. No; this is our private property, and we have a right to charge what we want to for it." Nevertheless, the Government did establish a commission to fix and determine what the rate was, and ultimately, in 1906, made it absolute that the Government had the right to fix what the rate for the carriage of property should be and the Supreme Court of the United States has sustained it all the way through.

What is the difference between directly and absolutely and unequivocally saying, so that everybody can know what you are doing, that the earning capacity of a railroad shall be limited to 6 per cent, and having the commission in an indirect way say that the freight rate for hauling a bale of cotton shall be so much, and for a bag of potatoes so much, and for a bull yearling so much, and that the charge for other commodities going over the railroad shall be limited to so much in the aggregate, saying to the railroad, "You shall not earn more than that amount."

It is exactly the same proposition in principle, and the same question that is raised to-day, that we have no right to limit the earning capacity of the railroads, was the song of the men who attempted to prevent a commission to regulate railroad rates more than 30 years ago.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not think the Senator is going to use that as a parallel in this instance. The court decided, and we have lived up to it since, that the Government has the right and the power in the regulation of interstate commerce to say what is a fair return for carrying a given unit of freight for the community or the individual. A certain amount is just and fair; but after it has established that as fair to the shipper and fair to the railroad, then the number of units that the carrier hauls spells the profit that it gets, and if it carries four times the given unit it gets four times that amount of profit.

Under this proposition you fix what is a fair and reasonable rate per unit of freight on the bale of cotton or the bull yearling and then you say, "After you have earned a certain amount we are going to stop you." In other words, it is like the law with reference to national banks and banks in the several States. There are different laws restricting the amount of interest banks can charge. I say, "You shall not charge more than 6 per cent on money." I do not say to the bank, "No, you have earned an aggfegate of 50 per cent in reference to your capital or 20 per cent in reference to your capital, and I am going to take the surplus." I simply say, "For the service of lending $100 we will let you have $6. The more hundred dollars you lend the move six dollars you get." The bill says, "No, the more hundred dollars you lend, the more six dollars you get up to a certain point, and the balance I take, so that the more service you render the less you get."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the Senator visualizes the necessity of the bill as I see it. It is true that we fixed freight rates in the past by saying what was a reasonable return on a bale of cotton, and then we let a man make just as much as he could out of carrying bales of cotton.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. At that rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, at that rate. That was regulating the amount of his return because if he did not have any other commodity than cotton to carry, and there were only a certain number of bales of cotton in his neighborhood and contiguous to his road, we absolutely fixed his earning capacity as the bill would fix it.

Of course, we made those rates uniform throughout a section of country, and if one railroad could carry more cotton than another, reflected back into its capital, it had a greater earning capacity than another.

That system might not have been bad. It might not have been unjust. It might have been workable if all railroads were operating under the same conditions; but they were not and are not, and they came up against the proposition that one railroad was making money and another one was going broke. We have got to meet the condition which the Senator from South Carolina reflected a moment ago when he said one road had to carry freight under a very much more costly condition of carriage than another. You can not do it under the old system of basing your rates and your earning capacity exclusively on a reasonable return for the cost of carriage. The necessity has arisen that a freight rate should be sufficient to allow the railroads to realize an earning capacity that will let them properly serve the people who live on the lines.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment. Unless it be for what they call the public necessity, I can not exactly see the justice in saying that on the aggregate property comprised in a certain zone the rate shall return 5½ per cent. It is composed of several individually owned roads.

Road A by thrift and economy is permitted to earn 5½ per cent on the capital invested, and the rate on the commodity is based upon that. By thrift and economy and enterprise and good will and service it carries a tonnage over its road that brings in 10 per cent.

Road B, by circumstances the reverse of those, earns only 4 per cent. Road B has not practiced thrift, economy, or enterprise; it does not earn it. And yet the thrifty road is cut down to where it must give up all above 6 per cent and the fractions that are allowed under certain conditions, and the excess is used for the purpose of lending to what are called the weak roads or unfortunate roads. There is no incentive for a road to earn other than the 5½ per cent, to practice any economy, to cut down the expenses of any of its officials, and to practice those things that would bring a larger return. It knows when it comes to the 5½ per cent that, so far as it is concerned, it is working for some other road than itself.

Mr. Thom was a railroad executive, but I quote him because his illustration seemed to me to be apt. He said a railroad, by practicing the virtues I have mentioned, in 10 months earned 5½ per cent. The road contiguous to it takes 12 months to earn the 5½ per cent. All the tonnage hauled by the first railroad in two months is given to the public as a gratuity. That road is then absolutely hauling and carrying units of freight and passengers absolutely for nothing, because within the first 10 months it earned all the Government would allow it. It could not stop functioning; it had to keep on operating and piling up a surplus to pay other roads that had not practiced the same thrift and the same economy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I think that is exactly the argument that was made 30 years ago. There is nothing new about it, except that conditions have absolutely changed. The argument is just exactly that employed by the gentlemen who owned the railroads 30 years ago, that Congress had no right to put any limitation on their earning capacity. If, for the hauling of wheat to market, road A can charge a certain freight rate and can get it from the shippers, and road B can not get it and can not move the freight, is the Senator going to say that road A shall not charge that freight rate if it can make the people on its road pay it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the argument now, and——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And, if the Senator will allow me, that was the argument made by the railroads 30 years ago. I take it that the Senator from South Carolina does not insist that we can not provide what is a just and reasonable return to railroads, but he is insisting that we are taking away their incentive to service. Let us see how far we shall take away that incentive.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before the Senator goes any further, I should like to make my position clear in connection with the reference the Senator made to the railroads, saying "This is our private property, and we ought to be allowed to charge what we please." They have, however, been impressed with a public character; everyone recognizes that they are public utilities, and that the Government has a right to say what is a just and reasonable charge on a given commodity, taking a general average and having regard to a proper return on the money invested. Now, going further than we have ever gone before, they might agree that on the aggregate property within a given district the return should reach 5½ per cent, and that according to tonnage and to the general conditions they would fix a rate to bring 5½ per cent. They figure up the amount of tonnage there and the rate each of the articles that make up the tonnage shall bear in order to produce 5½ per cent. That is fixed. Then it is said to the roads: "Go to it; here are the conditions under which you are to function." Each one of them starts out. Each can earn 5½ per cent. One road does all in its power to compete with its fellows and to get as much of the freight as it can, because the rate is based on the value of the aggregate property. When that road has obtained the tonnage and the passengers and has reached the 5½ per cent point of return it ceases to enjoy further returns for services that it renders. In other words, when we fix the rate and say, "This is what you are allowed," if the carrier earns more than that and we take any of that return from the carrier one of two things is certain: We have not fixed a fair and just rate to the shipper and what we take is the shipper's money, or it was a fair and just rate to the shipper and it is the railroad's money.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, let me ask the Senator a question. There are one or two railroads—I have one in mind—that I understand were earning before the war 30 per cent on their stock.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was not on the value of the property?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On their stock; not on the value of their property. Would the Senator be willing to say because one road can earn 30 per cent on its stock that all other roads should earn 30 per cent on their stock?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know the Senator would not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am saying that if we strike an average and take all the roads and put them all in the same condition and say, "This is the charge; this is a reasonable rate to the public based, under the new conditions, on the value of the property which you have invested; we are going to allow you so much on the unit carried," and the railroad gets busy and tries to increase the number of units that it carries, both as to passengers and as to freight—I say that once having fixed the rates and said, "This rate is reasonable to the shipper and reasonable to the railroad," having fixed it on the basis of a return of 5½ per cent, and one road in a given group earns more than 5½ per cent, either you have fixed an unreasonable rate per unit of freight and passengers and the shipper is entitled to a refund or you have taken from the railroad what it is justly entitled to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will tell the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I say——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want the Senator to conclude.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will conclude with this statement: I have heard the argument advanced—and whatever weight should be attached to it those advancing it are at liberty to attach—that the Government is justified in taking this money in that it is to be used for railroad purposes. Then, there is impressed by indirection and not by direction a tax on a given road over and above an excess profit tax assessed and collected for the benefit of other carriers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that perhaps if he were visualizing this proposition entirely from the standpoint of the railroads and their invested capital, I could understand his position and I could concede that his argument might be sound, based on the standpoint that if they were all in a race for money, there should not be any limitation placed on the contestants and that the fellow who could run the fastest should get the most, but that is not the standpoint from which we are looking at this question. Primarily the railroads are chartered for the purpose of rendering a public service; they are public service corporations; and they are entitled to a reasonable return on the money invested, on the value of their property as public service corporations; but there can be no doubt that in the interest of the public the return should be limited.

The argument that these corporations are entitled to make all they can make because under certain terms and conditions they were allowed to make it in the past is no more justified at this time than it was 30 years ago. If 6 per cent is a reasonable return on the property invested, then the return should be limited to 6 per cent; if it is not a reasonable return, then we should in this bill increase it to more than 6 per cent, and allow them all to have a standard up to which they may tax the people. But when we have let them come up to the full maximum standard, then, in the interest of the public, in my judgment, no man can say that we have not the right to put a limitation on their earning capacity.

Why, we do that in the case of all public service corporations. It has been the custom in this country to limit their earning capacity by the freight rate or the charge on kilowatts of electricity or units of gas; but practically every public service corporation has a limitation on its earning capacity fixed by the public. This bill merely fixes the limitation in a different way, but a more certain way than did the law 30 years ago. What difference is there in principle? None. If the Senator says that the earning capacity of 6 per cent allowed to the railroads under this bill is too great, he has the right to move an amendment to make it less. I do not think it is too great.

The Senator intimates that we have destroyed competition. Of course, competition in freight rates has been destroyed before; it is destroyed now. There are three or four roads that leave my home city of Birmingham and go to New York; yet the cost of shipping a ton of pig iron from Birmingham to New York is the same over all of them. Competition in freight rates has gone, and it will be gone under this bill.

It is said there is a value in competition for service, and I think there is; and, in a way, this bill recognizes such competition. Originally as the bill was written it provided for a 6 per cent return upon the value of the property; but the argument was made in the committee that that cut off all competition; that when a road earned 6 per cent on the value of its property it would stop and would not try to earn any more. The committee then modified the bill and provided that within 6 and 7 per cent it could retain one-half of all it earned, and above 7 per cent it could retain one-quarter of all it earned. That is undoubtedly an incentive to the roads to compete for business, and, in my judgment, meets the argument that competition in service has been eliminated under the terms of the bill.

The men who make the argument that we are cutting off competition in service amongst the railroads overlook the fact that there are probably nearly a dozen railroads in the United States to-day—I mean main-line railroads; you may find a coal road here or an iron road there, or some special short line that is making very large returns on its money—but I think I am safe in saying that there are not a dozen of the main railroads in the country that are earning 6 per cent on the value of their property or can or will earn 6 per cent on the value of their property in the future, and that as to those railroads competition in service is there and will remain there for many years in attempting to climb up to the maximum earning capacity of 6 per cent fixed by the bill. I know that there are a few roads under very favorable conditions that are able to earn more than the 6 per cent, and I think most of the cry that is being reflected to Congress against the provisions of this bill limiting the return primarily to 6 per cent, with the increase above that as I have just indicated, comes from those roads, not a dozen of the great transportation systems of America. This bill can not be written for special cases. This bill can not be enacted to take care of some particular line of road. The real question is whether or not 6 per cent is a reasonable return and a reasonable charge to be reflected into the freight rates of the people who live along the line of the road.

As to what is above that, objection is made. They say it is a tax. It is not a tax; it is a limitation on the right to earn money, and that limitation has been conceded and recognized for 30 years. This money is not taken and given as a gift to the other railroads; no. The increased earning above 6 per cent goes into a special Government fund.

It does not go to the railroads; it goes to the Government, to a Government board, to be used for what purpose? To be used in the interest of the people of the United States. Have we not the right to use money in the hands of the Government for the development of transportation facilities? How many hundreds of millions of dollars have we invested to-day in great shipbuilding plants and shipping, first to take care of the war situation, and now maintained in order to expand the commerce of this country and furnish the American people with shipping facilities? If it is right to limit the earning capacity of these railroads in any way, then it is right to limit them to a reasonable return. Every man may have his judgment as to what is reasonable; but when we fix what is a reasonable return, they have no right to complain that we take the balance of the money away from them and use it for a great public service.

What is the public service? First, it may be used to lend to the railroads where they need money to improve their facilities to the public. It can be loaned to them to build new cars. It can be loaned to them to double-track their roads. It can be loaned to them to build new spur tracks and new lines. It can be loaned to them, at reasonable rates of interest, to develop the transportation facilities along their existing lines. Is not that in the interest of the public? It will have a tendency to bring down the money cost and the money charges for the borrowing of railroads. It will put this fund that the Government has in hand in competition with the banker and the broker who has been lending money for the public development at higher rates of interest, and that is clearly in the public interest.

There is another purpose for which it can be used in the public service, and that is to invest it in a great car-service corporation, where the Government can build cars and engines and rent them to the roads, the weaker or the stronger roads, in order to give transportation facilities to the public.

Is not that in the interest of the American people? Is it not in the interest of the man who lives on the line? And what right has the railroad owner to complain? He may say, "I have a great, powerful road, and I do not want you to give additional facilities to my weaker competitor. I want to keep it down, so that it can not function"; but that is a selfish argument that can not go here.

Suppose this fund accumulates so that we can develop a great transportation corporation. There have been complaints in the Congress within this session against the meat packers that their monopoly has been developed because they control the refrigerator-car service. If you had this bill through and that fund existing, money from this fund could be used to build for the Government refrigerator cars that could be used to meet any monopoly and give service to people who were financially unable to build their own cars. In a thousand ways the public may be served by a fund of this kind, and properly served; and it is no answer to the proposition to say that it should not be done merely because some particular road—one in a hundred in this country—can earn more than 6 per cent upon its value, and insist to-day that the old system should exist and that it should be allowed to go on and earn to its full capacity, regardless of the public interest.

Why, this is a developing country. The country is new and the railroads are new. Where does the argument that has been made lead us to, that we should put no limitation whatever upon the earning capacity of these railroads? Where should it lead to? When a railroad is developed through a new country, with no factories along its lines, with agriculture undeveloped, with a scanty population, its earning capacity must be small; but as it develops and grows and population comes and the factory comes, and the mill hand, its freight rates and passenger rates increase and its earning capacity grows and grows.

Does anybody think for a moment that the railroads of this country have ceased to grow or that their earning capacity has ceased to grow? Must we go on and say that, because a rate is reasonable to-day, under those same rates an earning capacity of five times what it is to-day may be reflected into the treasury of the road two decades from now? Nobody can maintain that argument for a minute. Then, if that can not be maintained, they must consent to the proposition that we have a distinct right in the public interest to limit the earning capacity of these railroads after we have given them a just and reasonable and fair return on their money value.

As I said, if some man here thinks that 6 per cent is not a fair return upon the money value, it would be absolutely in order and proper for him to move to make it 7 or 8 or 10 per cent; but I do not think he can justify by any argument whatever the contention that because one railroad can earn a larger return under a certain system of rates that were allowed to grow up, because if they had not grown up some other railroad would have broken, we are not entitled to adopt a new system and limit the amount of charge upon the transportation of the people of America.

That is all there is in section 6, I think. It is not a difficult problem. I think it is a fairer and a juster way to fix the basis of rate making in this country than the present law. I think it will give the railroads of the country an opportunity to respond to the needs of the public more fully than they have ever done in the past; and if that is so, then section 6 should be adopted. That is the crucial situation in the rate-making and earning capacity of this bill.

As I said before, I have heard no Senator complain about the limitations on the issuance of railroad securities. Many of the pages of this bill are taken up with suggestions and amendments made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, about which practically every man here will agree. There are but few items, so far as I can see, that are in dispute or can be in dispute, except the question of the rate-making power, the amount of money that will be raised by it, and the problem regarding the labor features of this bill.

Mr. President, when I rose I intended to address myself to section 6 and to the provisions of the bill which relate to labor. I have spoken much longer than I expected, due to the interruptions which have occurred. I was unable to come to the Senate yesterday on account of sickness, and I find, now that I am on my feet, that I am unable to go on fully with the discussion in reference to the other features of the bill, and though I should have liked to have concluded to-night, I will have to pass over for the present my discussion of the clauses of the bill that relate to labor, and hope to have an opportunity to discuss them before the consideration of the bill is concluded.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is one formal amendment which I desire to offer. On page 13, line 12, of the bill, I move to strike out the words "its property investment" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the value of its property held for and used in the service of transportation, determined as herein provided."

I think there will be no objection whatever to this substitution. The words which I have sought to strike out are in the bill through an inadvertence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the following as a separate section. I will state that it is the text of a joint resolution introduced, I think, by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and it passed the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIAL in the chair). The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following:

That the effective date on and after which the provisions of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, shall become and be effective is hereby deferred and extended to July 1, 1920: Provided, That said section shall be effective as to all corporations organized after January 12, 1918.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to offer this amendment. I do not know whether there is any objection to it or not. If there is, I will withdraw it. This amendment is taken from the joint resolution which passed the Senate on October 14, 1919, and it is now pending in the House.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator explain, in a few words, what is designed to be subserved by the amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. While the matter was not brought to my attention by the Senator from Minnesota, I think I know what is desired to be accomplished by the amendment. In section 10 of the so-called Clayton Act there is a provision with regard to contracts made between railway corporations, or possibly it is broader than that and includes contracts between all corporations and contractors or mercantile concerns between which there might be a community of directors.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I remember it now.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was found very desirable a little later to postpone the effective date of that act. My recollection is that it has been postponed twice, and during this session the Senator from Minnesota introduced the joint resolution, and it was reported by the Judiciary Committee, postponing the effective date again until July 1, 1920. It passed the Senate without any objection, I believe, and is now pending in the House. I shall make no objection whatever to its being attached to the bill, although it really does not belong, in its subject matter, to the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether the amendment postpones the operation of that act beyond July, 1920?

Mr. CURTIS. No; until that time.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a duplication of the joint resolution passed at the last session?

Mr. CURTIS. Of the joint resolution that passed the Senate. I was requested this afternoon to offer it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Kansas for a moment, do I understand that it applies to section 10 of the act?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; to section 10 of the Clayton Act.

Mr. POMERENE. Relating to the sale of securities?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; to all kinds of dealings between corporations. It not only applies to the sale of securities, but to the purchases that are made by common carriers of supplies and the like.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that if there is any objection to it I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not object. I simply wanted to understand it.

Mr. CURTIS. I offered it by request, and understood it had passed the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest that section 10 of the act be incorporated in the RECORD, so that Senators may understand what it is. Perhaps it ought to be read, so that Senators here may understand what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read section 10 of the act approved August 20, 1916, as follows:

SEC. 10. That after two years from the approval of this act no common carrier engaged in commerce shall have any dealings in securities, supplies, or other articles of commerce, or shall make or have any contracts for construction or maintenance of any kind, to the amount of more than $50,000 in the aggregate, in any one year, with another corporation, firm, partnership, or association when the said common carrier shall have upon its board of directors or as its president, manager, or as its purchasing or selling officer, or agent in the particular transaction any person who is at the same time a director, manager, or purchasing or selling officer of, or who has any substantial interest in, such other corporation, firm, partnership, or association, unless and except such purchases shall be made from, or such dealings shall be with, the bidder whose bid is the most favorable to such common carrier, to be ascertained by competitive bidding under regulations to be prescribed by rule or otherwise by the Interstate Commerce Commission. No bid shall be received unless the name and address of the bidder or the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers thereof, if the bidder be a corporation, or of the members, if it be a partnership or firm, be given with the bid.

Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, do or attempt to do anything to prevent anyone from bidding or shall do any act to prevent free and fair competition among the bidders or those desiring to bid shall be punished as prescribed in this section in the case of an officer or director.

Every such common carrier having any such transactions or making any such purchases shall within 30 days after making the same file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a full and detailed statement of the transaction showing the manner of the competitive bidding, who were the bidders, and the names and addresses of the directors and officers of the corporations and the members of the firm or partnership bidding; and whenever the said commission shall, after investigation or hearing, have reason to believe that the law has been violated in and about the said purchases or transactions it shall transmit all papers and documents and its own views or findings regarding the transaction to the Attorney General.

If any common carrier shall violate this section it shall be fined not exceeding $25,000; and every such director, agent, manager, or officer thereof who shall have knowingly voted for or directed the act constituting such violation or who shall have aided or abetted in such violation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, or confined in jail not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer an amendment on page 81.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 81, in lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "to construct a suitable dock and." Strike out lines 14, 15, 16, and that part of line 17 ending with the period after the word "sections" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable and can be made with safety to the public and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay." In line 22, strike out the words "docks and," and in line 23 strike out the words "docks and."

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendment proposed makes the section conform to the existing law, paragraph "a" of section 6, and also correspond substantially to section 411 of the House bill.

According to the provision as it is now written, it gives the board authority to require a water carrier to construct a suitable dock, and the dock is considered as a terminal within the meaning of the act. That gives the board practical control over water transportation. I do not think that ought to be done. It seems to me the law ought to be left just as it is.

Paragraph A of section 6 as it reads now gives the commission authority—

To establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constucted from the dock to the limits of its right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carrier a spur track or tracks to the dock. This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable, can be made with safety to the public, and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay.

I think that is all the authority the commission or the board ought to have in connection with waterways. To give it the authority stated in this connection would enable it practically to dominate a waterway. It could impose practically any burden that it saw fit to impose, and if it were inclined to favor the railway it could impose burdens that would favor it.

Furthermore, under this section the Interstate Commerce Commission would have control over the docks, for instance, in the city of Seattle, where they have constructed large terminal docks and facilities or waterway terminals. Under the express language of the section as it is herein the Interstate Commerce Commission would have control over them. I do not think that ought to be, and I can not believe that the Senator from Iowa really intended that that should be.

So I move to strike out the provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand it, this was a recommendation made by the Interstate Commerce Commission and was incorporated in the bill introduced by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House and incorporated in the bill introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. The matter referred to by the Senator from Washington was not discussed at any great length in the committee, and I am not able to make any definite statement with regard to the attitude of the committee upon the matter.

That is all I care to say. I have no authority to accept it, but if the views of the Senator from Washington seem to the Senate sound, Senators will vote accordingly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would suggest that while probably under our rules it is hardly proper to refer to what action has been taken in the House, upon discussion and consideration the House struck out those provisions and made the section conform to what this would provide.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is quite proper for the Senator from Washington to make that reference, because the House has passed the bill and it is now on the Senate Calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true. I have the House provision here as it passed the House, and I will read it:

A. They shall establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock at which interchange of passengers or property is made by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constructed from the dock to the limits of the railroad right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carrier a track or tracks to the dock. The commission shall have full authority to determine and prescribe the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracks shall be operated, and it may, either in the construction or the operation of such tracks, determine what sum shall be paid to or by either carrier: Provided, That construction required by the commission under the provisions of this paragraph shall be subject to the same restrictions as to findings of public convenience and necessity and other matters as its construction required under section 1 of this act.

It cuts out all control of the Interstate Commerce Commission over the docks, and so forth, and I think that ought to be done. Upon the statement of the chairman of the committee I will allow it to go to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The SECRETARY. Amend, on page 28, by striking out all of line 23 after the word "reasonable," and lines 24 and 25; and also strike out all of page 29 down to and including all of line 14.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is the part of the bill to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] referred a day or two ago during his discussion. I am compelled to say that in my judgment Congress has no right and can not under the Constitution require the carrying for mere cost of traffic by a carrier directed so to do by the Interstate Commerce Commission or by the transportation board. The point made by the Senator from Wisconsin seems to me to be quite well taken and I shall not resist the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment, which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of page 35 after the word "awarded," in line 14, and all of page 36, down to and including the word "properties" in line 5.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I be permitted to see the amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. I will state that the amendment strikes from the bill the guaranty of a return not exceeding the standard return provided in the present law to railroads pending reorganization. It is a matter that I discussed at some length a day or two ago. I wish to say now that I can not conceive of the Senate being willing to clothe the board of transportation with the power to obligate the United States Government to the extent of possibly hundreds of millions of dollars to guarantee a return to a railroad that may indicate its willingness and desire to enter into the plan of consolidation proposed by the board and to reorganize under that plan.

No one can say how many hundreds of millions of dollars, or even billions of dollars, it might obligate the Government to pay. Certainly no such vague and indefinite power should be granted, it seems to me, to the board of transportation.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the authority granted here could have, if exercised, the consequences suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, I can easily understand how apprehensive Congress would be and how reluctant it would be to grant the authority. But I think the Senator from Wisconsin exaggerates, not intentionally of course, but overestimates the loss that could by any possibility be sustained by the United States through the power here granted. The power is to guarantee to the roads which are involved in the consolidation, and only during the process of consolidation, what we understand as the standard return.

When it is considered that the standard return is based upon the three years prior to July 1, 1917, when the growth and development which we confidently expect in the United States are considered, it is impossible for me to conceive that the guaranty by the Government during the short period of consolidation could involve the United States in any considerable loss; I very much doubt whether there could be any loss. However, it is not a direction to the board; it is authority to the board; and it may, I think, be fairly assumed that the board would act in the interest of the people of the United States.

The entire guaranteed return for all the railroads in the United States for an entire year is about $900,000,000. This at any given time would involve, I take it, comparatively few properties and for but a short time. The chances that these properties would not be earning substantially their standard return or the return of the test period would, it seems to me, be very remote. The only reason the provision is in the bill is because the committee believed that it was proper that there should be furnished some security, some inducement to the railroad companies to carry forward the governmental plan of consolidation.

I recognize that the point made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is not vital to the bill, and if we would accomplish the purposes of the bill, so far as I am concerned, I do not hesitate to take some risk. I do not feel, Mr. President, that I can accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. I am acting for the committee; I have, in a great many instances, subordinated my own individual opinion in order to carry forward the work which the committee has directed me to do; but in this instance I must submit the matter to the good judgment of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to restate the amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. The amendment strikes out, on page 35——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Of the last print of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I have the original print of the bill. Beginning on line 8, the remainder of page 35, and the first paragraph upon page 36. It proposes to strike out the guaranty of the Government to the railroads pending reorganization.

Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I will say that so long as the railroads are prosperous and are making the standard return, in my judgment, there will not be the voluntary consolidations provided for in the bill, especially if the going rate of money when normal conditions again obtain shall be less than 6 per cent. Consolidations, however, will come under the bill very rapidly if we have an industrial depression in this country; and I think there is no one of us who have given thought to this subject who does not realize the possibility, and the very strong possibility, of such industrial depression ensuing before conditions in this country become normal. If such a depression does come, railroads by the score, with this guaranty in the bill, are going to accept the plan of consolidation proposed by the board in order to get the guaranty. Why should the Government in a period of industrial depression, where all investors must take their share of losses, give to the owners of railroad securities the same high return that they received during the period of their highest prosperity?

The Senator from Iowa says that it is left to the discretion of the board. That is true; but I undertake to say that if we have such a depression, the call upon the board for this guaranty will amount to many hundreds of millions of dollars per year, and it may cover a period of years.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Wisconsin will note that the action of the board requires the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I hope the Senator will comment upon this feature of the guaranty. This is not a guaranty for any railroad that does not agree upon the valuation of the property sought to be consolidated as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We all look forward to some differences of opinion with regard to these valuations. It is highly desirable, however, that the work of the commission shall be accepted with regard to the values; otherwise long litigation may ensue. This provision offers to any railway system about to consolidate with another a guaranty only in the event that those who are in the act of consolidation will agree that the value which has been put upon the properties by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be the value upon which the consolidation shall take place.

Mr. LENROOT. In answer to that I will say that so far as this bill is concerned the guaranty is operative at any time until the reorganizations and consolidations become complete.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true, but not until the great process of consolidation throughout the United States becomes complete; it will continue only during the process of the consolidation of the particular properties involved.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; that is what I meant. But it may well be that before this guaranty would be invoked at all the valuation will not have been determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission but judicially determined under the law itself. It is not optional with the owners of the roads to negotiate with reference to the valuation, but the valuation will become fixed, and if they do not voluntarily accept the valuation thus fixed they can be compelled to accept that valuation under the exercise of the right of eminent domain. So that I do not think that suggestion of the Senator has any very great force, although it is true.

I believe that voluntary consolidations will be accepted so as to make a given plan of reorganization complete only in time of industrial depression, and that being true, it is clear that the United States Treasury will be called upon to pay, perhaps, hundreds of millions of dollars. That is a matter that ought not to be left to any subordinate board of this Government. If when the time comes it is proper in the public interest to afford these companies the guaranty, Congress itself should pass upon that question at that time.

Certainly we ought not now to give any subordinate body the right to obligate the Government to no one knows how many hundreds of millions of dollars.

Then, again, I do not see any reason why there should be any guaranty to the railroads simply because they are going through a period of reorganization. That is a financial matter alone; it ought not to affect operation in the slightest degree. The mere fact of reorganization under this plan ought not to affect the net earnings of individual roads in the least. I do not see any possible reason for the roads securing from the United States Treasury a guaranty as is provided here.

Mr. President, this is a very important matter. I am sorry the chairman resists the amendment, but if it is to be resisted I feel that it is so important that I shall be obliged to call for a quorum unless the amendment is passed over. I am willing, however, to withdraw it for this evening and to reoffer it to-morrow, if the Senator so desires.

Mr. CUMMINS. I see no reason for withdrawing the amendment, for we must either have a quorum to pass upon it or we must take a recess.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

RECESS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the time has nearly come at which it was in our minds, I think, to take a recess, and in order to avoid the necessity of drawing festive Senators from the social functions in which they are undoubtedly very happily engaged at this moment I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 8 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 17, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 16, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Sometimes, our Father in heaven, we find ourselves on the verge of doubt and uncertainty, then it is that the earth seems slipping from beneath our feet; but we are reassured when we remember the heavenly promise:

Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.

So when we throw wide the portals of our soul, the Divine Guest enters and restores faith, hope, love, and we reenter with perfect confidence the kingdom of heaven and live again with Thee. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. J. Res. 137) authorizing the Secretary of War to construct a pontoon bridge across the Chattahoochee River at West Point, Ga., and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 137. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to construct a pontoon bridge across the Chattahoochee River at West Point, Ga., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that, on December 15, they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution and bill:

H. J. Res. 260. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1919; and

H. R. 1199. An act to prohibit the purchase, sale, or possession for the purpose of sale of certain wild birds in the District of Columbia.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GOOD, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported a bill (H. R. 11223) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Employees' Compensation Commission and the Public Health Service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLANTON reserved all points of order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the House agreed by unanimous consent that at the close of the debate on the report now before the House, business in order on Monday should be in order to-day. The probability is that the business under the rule and one or two other matters that are privileged—a privileged resolution by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], a privileged report from the Committee on Printing—may take the major part of the day. In order that we may have a full day for the consideration of matters that were in order on Monday, I ask unanimous consent that we may dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow and business which was in order on Monday shall be in order on Wednesday.

In making that request I want to state that I have consulted the chairman and several members of the Committee on the Public Lands with which committee the call rests, and they have no objection to this request being granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the order making business which was in order on Monday in order to-day be rescinded, and that instead to-morrow Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with and Monday business be in order then. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming, in view of the program that he is laying out for the consideration of bills before the House, if he expects at any time to call up and take action on the Mondell soldiers' settlement bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for "the gentleman from Wyoming" to assure the gentleman from Alabama that it would please "the gentleman from Wyoming" if such an opportunity were offered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think he could create such an opportunity if he desired?

Mr. MONDELL. Not just at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we are preparing for, as I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming, a recess to commence Saturday over until January 5. Surely there are some legislative matters of greater importance than the Private Calendar that should be disposed of before January 5. In other words, if we dispense with Calendar Wednesday, to indulge in four hours' debate on nothing, and for the Private Calendar, I do not think we are meeting with the obligations that rest upon the House, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

HOUSE REPORT 487.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is the further consideration of House report 487.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think there ought to be a quorum present to hear this debate, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ackerman	Bland, Mo.	Cantrill	Davis, Minn.
Anthony	Booher	Connally	Denison

Hudspeth	Mott	Sears

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-one Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, when I stopped yesterday afternoon I had spoken longer than I have for many years in the House of Representatives, and longer than I desired to. My only apology for continuing to-day is the complex character of the matter which has been brought before the House for debate. I have sought, and shall continue to seek, to state the facts of the record, because it is upon the facts of the record that these matters must rest and that public judgment should be formed—not upon the inferences and intimations of the majority nor the inferences and suggestions of the minority. I wish it were possible for every Member of the House to read the record. If judgment is to be asked, if executive and judicial propositions are to be thrust before the legislative branch of the Government and discussed before the country, then we should adapt ourselves to the requirements of the situation and read the facts. And upon that record of facts—all the record, not a page here or a page there—the minority is content to stand here and before the country.

Yesterday afternoon I had just concluded a brief review of the organization under which the purchases of copper were made for the use of the Government. I omitted to say, and perhaps it will be of interest to the House to know, that the Government of the United States purchased during the war 670,000,000 pounds of copper. This was in addition to the amount—I do not know how much that was, but it was immense, probably as much as the Government itself purchased—which was being purchased by those who had Government contracts for munitions of war, and also in addition to the tremendous amount—I do not know how much that was—which was being furnished to the allied powers in Europe.

I think it is proper, and I think the House will be interested to some extent to take up now the facts of the disposition of the surplus which remained at the signing of the armistice. With the signing of the armistice the copper market became completely and thoroughly demoralized. It was known, of course, that the Government had large quantities of raw copper, but just how much was not known. This condition of affairs in the copper market continued through November, December, and January, as I recall. It was not known what the Government proposed to do with its surplus copper, whether it would hold it or whether it would be placed upon the market. Along in January or February, 1919, if I remember correctly, there was presented to some branches of the Government a statement as to the condition. Bear in mind that the production of copper had by every incentive that the Government could properly hold before the producers been speeded up to the highest point during the period of the war. Every mine that could possibly be put into production had been opened to production. It was absolutely essential as a military necessity.

The condition when the statement was presented was that there was something like a billion pounds of raw copper in the hands of the producers, in the smelters, and at various storage points. One hundred and seventy-five million dollars was tied up in this copper. The labor situation was completely demoralized. Working as they did upon the standard scale of prices, it was impossible to determine what labor could be paid and should be paid under the agreements had with the mine owners. With this condition confronting the Government and confronting the people of the country, steps were taken to clarify the situation. Representatives of the Government and copper men, producers, through the United Metals Selling Co. in particular, because that had been the company which had handled the copper purchased by this Government, while the Standard Co., I think it was, handled that which was sold to the allied countries, arranged conferences to see what could be done to relieve the situation. A number of conferences were held, numerous propositions were canvassed. Differences of opinion arose that were sharp and marked, but all of these negotiations finally culminated, about April 10, 1919, in a contract with the United Metals Selling Co. whereby that company bound itself to take from the Government, beginning in the month of April, 1919, and continuing if it should become necessary until the month of June, 1920, 5,000,000 pounds of copper per month up until and including January, 1920, and 10,000,000 pounds per month after January, 1920, up until and including June, 1920. Before it engaged in that contract the United Metals Selling Co. had the cooperation and assurance of the various copper producers whom it represented that these contracts would be carried out. This copper was to be taken at a certain price, and I read now from the contract itself:

> The contract price for copper in usual commercial shapes is hereby fixed at the monthly average New York price for electrolytic copper quoted by the Engineering and Mining Journal published in New York.

That is the standard journal of the trade.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman be good enough to state the volume from which he quotes?

Mr. GARRETT. I am quoting from part 1 of serial 6, at page 56 of the hearings before the subcommittee, No. 5, and I read from the contract itself. There was another condition of this contract, slightly complicated, which I read:

> Should the sales of copper owned or controlled by the purchaser and all producers of copper represented by it, in any one month during the months of April, 1919, to January, 1920, both inclusive, exceed 50,000,000 pounds, and during the months of February, 1920, to June, 1920, both inclusive, exceed 100,000,000 pounds, in such event the quantities specified in the above schedule shall be increased by an amount equal to 20 per cent of such excess.

In other words, that meant that if the United Metals Selling Co. and those producers whom it represented should sell in excess of 50,000,000 pounds of outside copper, not Government copper, there should be taken, in addition to the 5,000,000 pounds that the United Metals Selling Co. was absolutely obligated to take from the Government, 20 per cent of the total amount sold, and that 20 per cent should be taken out of the Government's supply.

The effect of that was immediate. The market became certain and the Government received for its copper the prevailing average monthly prices as shown by the market reports. As to whether that was wise or not, of course the judgment of men may differ, but I should like to know what there is about it to justify any imputation of fraud.

Another case has been referred to in the report, though not as yet upon the floor of the House; but, as I am anticipating that it is likely to be, perhaps I should say something concerning it. I do not wish to say much, partly for the same reason that I gave when I expressed myself in regard to the Standard Steel Car Co. settlement on yesterday. I refer now to the Jones & Laughlin contract, mentioned in the majority report. This is a steel-manufacturing concern located in or near Pittsburgh, Pa. It entered into a contract with the Government of the United States to construct 300 modern coke ovens. The Government's interest in it was to procure toluol for use in the manufacture of high explosives and ammonium sulphate. The contract is in our record, and is quite lengthy, and differs from some other contracts. Briefly, it may be stated that it was estimated, and this estimate was expressed in the face of the contract, that after these 300 ovens should have been completed there would be produced 810,000 gallons of toluol per annum, and the Government bound itself to take the full amount of production, whatever it might be, at the price of $1.50 per gallon. I do not now remember the estimate as to the amount of ammonium sulphate. These ovens had not been completed at the time the armistice was signed. The Government sought a termination of the contract, and upon investigation it was found that it was so near completion that it appeared to be to the interest of the Government to let the company complete the ovens and settle upon the basis of the original contract, and accordingly this was done. A claim was filed before the Pittsburgh board of claims, and was there first passed upon.

Along in February, 1919, a meeting was held in New York of representatives of the Government and of chemical men—I believe some chemical experts were present—this meeting being called by the head or chief of the claims board of New York particularly to discuss this toluol situation and to reach some conclusion as to how the many toluol contracts and claims should be settled. That meeting was attended by a representative of the Government by the name of Falk.

I have forgotten for the moment the precise position which he held, but I think he was a chief in the Ordnance Bureau of the Raw Materials Division throughout the war. He had been in private life a consulting engineer, as I now remember. He had made under his direction some time during the latter part of the war a table which is commonly referred to as the Falk chart, and it was referred to in the order issued by the Claims Board Division of the War Department. This chart undertook to estimate the amount of probable production of toluol at given plants. There is testimony from a very respectable source, in my opinion, in our record to the effect that there were errors in this Falk chart, though he himself assumed full responsibility for the chart, although he did not personally prepare it, insisting that it was correct. The Pittsburgh claims board along in March, I think it must have been, or perhaps in April, 1919, made an award making its recommendation as to the amount that Jones & Laughlin should be paid on the cancellation of the contract. I think that award reached the bureau board here, and if I am in error I will thank the gentleman from Illinois to correct me, but before it was taken up for consideration by the bureau here the Pittsburgh claims board received knowledge of this Falk chart. Jones & Laughlin had declined to accept their award. So they recalled the claim from this board, reinvestigated it, and apparently settled it in the light of the Falk chart, and that increased the award made to Jones & Laughlin, which they accepted, by the sum of $350,000. Now, I wish to state all the facts and state them fairly. That settlement on the Falk chart did apparently give the very highest reasonable credit for production that seemed at all probable in the industry. It did allow payment for an amount based upon the estimated production of the full plant of 300 ovens running 24 hours a day every day in the year at full capacity. Now, that is the substance of all we know about that claim. I do not know all the elements that entered into the consideration in the negotiation and adjustment of this particular transaction. Jones & Laughlin have not been heard before the committee.

The officer of the Government who actually negotiated the settlement was not heard by the committee nor called by the committee for any explanation of the matter. I do not hesitate to say to you, because I wish to be perfectly frank, that it seemed to me that the settlement was too large, but I do not believe that there is the slightest justification from anything which appears in our record of any imputation of fraud against the officer who negotiated it. It is a question of business judgment. That gentleman is available——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question as to the copper-selling contracts?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As a lawyer I have had this experience: The wheat market took a tremendous fall a number of years ago. Day by day the papers of a certain city quoted wheat at $1.25 a bushel and you could not sell a bushel of wheat to save your life for a dollar. Now, this selling contract provides as the sole standard, as I understood the gentleman, the quotations in a particular paper, not in all papers, but in one paper alone. I happen to know, because I was interested as an attorney of this situation, that one broker furnished all the quotations for the papers at that time, and I happen to know that he was loaded to death with speculative and real wheat. Now, is not your contract subject to the objection that this particular paper might not show at all the selling price of copper in the months to which the gentleman refers from time to time throughout the life of the contract?

Mr. GARRETT. I will say to the gentleman that in the first place this paper, as I understand it, is recognized as the standard journal of the copper metal industry. In the next place it is a fact that there was verification of the prices quoted. The gentleman will understand that this copper to be sold in April was not in fact sold and delivered in April. It would be sold in the following month, and so on, of subsequent months, at the average price as given in this journal for that month, and that price was verified by actual investigation of the prices at which copper was selling generally in the market. So I do not think that that criticism would apply.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But what I am criticizing is that by the contract as the gentleman describes it you do not have the right to verify, you do not have the right to correct, you do not have the right to vary, you put this absolutely in the power of this single paper and its quotations.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I did not read the full contract a few months ago, but I will say to the gentleman that, as a matter of fact, there was verification.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am not talking about what was done, because I do not know about that, and the gentleman has not stated as to that until now; but I was taking the gentleman's statement of the effect of the contract and its provisions and terms.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will examine the full contract—it is quite lengthy—he will find that the interests of the Government were absolutely protected. Now, upon the question of whether the contract was proper, the gentleman's judgment might differ from mine. It seems to me it was a very reasonable and proper proceeding.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman who previously requested to be answered illustrated his subject with wheat. Now, there is a method for verifying wheat prices. If you can sell wheat at a given figure in Liverpool, England, that is considered in this country to be the standard, valid price established. Now, is there a similar method for establishing a standard, current price for copper, so that the world may know what copper is sold for to-day? Is there a market somewhere that establishes a standard?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that there is any future speculation in actual copper. Speculation in regard to copper is in copper stocks and not in copper itself.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. RAKER. This contract has been running now about six months, has it not, and been in operation?

Mr. GARRETT. Longer than that. It began in April, 1919. Perhaps I may anticipate what the gentleman is going to ask me. All the Government's surplus copper has been disposed of long ago.

Mr. RAKER. The quotations in the paper name the value of copper throughout the country. Has there been any evidence presented by the majority of the committee to show that these quotations in the paper were fraudulent or improper, or lower or higher than the ordinary market throughout the country?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, no. There has been no question raised in the committee about that. Upon the contrary, a witness selected by the committee, who seemed to be a very bright gentleman, a Mr. Gibbs—I believe his name was—secretary to Senator BRANDEGEE, made an investigation of the journal and of the market conditions, and his figures, as testified to, bear out absolutely the statements of all the others in regard to the prices at which copper sold during those respective months. Oh, no; there is no question about that.

Mr. RAKER. Then as to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] that it might have been unfair to the Government by designating this paper, it turns out that it was not unfair?

Mr. GARRETT. It was not. The Government received——

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman understands that my suggestion was entirely as to the terms of the contract. I did not understand that the gentleman stated anything as to how the contract was carried out, nor did I understand until now that there was any investigation of that question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. As a matter of fact, Gibbs testified to the prices he had found in the Engineering and Mining Journal. That is true, is it not?

Mr. GARRETT. That is my recollection. And they accorded with the testimony that other witnesses had given before the committee—Wolfson and others that I remember. I have not understood there was any question at any time about that. The Government received its money and the concerns that sold it. I do not know how that happened or why they happened to do it, but my recollection is they charged no commissions on the sales which they made for the Government, selling it in the regular course of business along with other sales.

To revert for a moment, now, to the Jones & Laughlin contract, I wish to repeat that there is no reason why anyone should infer fraud or to imply or impute fraud to the negotiating officer of the Government in the settlement of this claim. As I say, he was not examined. The committee met him personally on its visit to Pittsburgh—a gentleman by the name of Dravo. He seemed to be a very excellent gentleman. I was very pleasantly impressed with him, and he consorted with me upon the same terms of equality that he did with the other gentlemen of the committee, although his political affiliations are different from mine. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I think that concludes about all that I have to say on the specific settlements mentioned in the majority report. I do desire, however, to direct the attention of the House to this statement of fact. Up to the time of the concluding of the testimony upon which report No. 463 on House resolution 381 was filed there had been settled of contracts, both formal and informal, more than 22,500. The uncompleted portion of these contracts and of claims settled or adjusted, in cases where the contracts were not completed, aggregate more than $2,000,000,000. These were adjusted and settled for about $330,000,000, and this includes $78,000,000 of partial settlements and awards upon other contracts. In other words, the War Department claims boards, and their subsidiary boards, if I may so term them, have been able to settle for about 12 per cent more than $2,000,000,000 of outstanding Government obligations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. How much were the total expenditures for the War Department?

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman mean for all purposes?

Mr. RAYBURN. For all purposes.

Mr. GARRETT. Something over $18,000,000,000. I have that testimony here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will refresh the gentleman's recollection, if he desires.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It was $14,500,000,000, approximately.

Mr. GARRETT. The statement which appears in our record is that, as of date of September 1, 1919, the expenditures and outstanding obligations were $18,501,117,999.12.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have seen it somewhere in the newspapers, or in the hearings or elsewhere, that somebody had testified to something like the figures the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] gives.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, the gentleman perhaps has in mind the fact that in answer to an inquiry made by the committee of the Secretary of War as to expenditures up to June 1, 1919, a statement was prepared by Gen. Lord, the Director of Finance.

That statement showed a total of $14,544,610,213.65, but that did not include any obligations. That purported to include only the expenditures and the amounts that had been passed to the credit of disbursing officers in the different departments.

There were some discrepancies, I might say, found in that statement of Gen. Lord's, and Gen. Lord, in testifying before the committee at one of its very first sessions before the full committee, directed attention to the fact that it should not be taken as absolutely accurate, because on account of the differences in bookkeeping in the different divisions there might be some errors, and Gen. Lord was particularly anxious to stress before the committee the point that it might not be taken with absolute accuracy. That was to be expected of Gen. Lord, of course, because he is a very efficient officer. The older Members will recall him, I know, as the able clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means when the Dingley bill was framed.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I am apprehensive that, perhaps, a wrong impression will be drawn from the gentleman's statement with regard to these two amounts. I am sure that the gentleman does not intend to leave the impression that it will be necessary after June 30, 1919, to pay approximately $4,000,000,000 in the discharge of contracts of the War Department that were then outstanding?

Mr. GARRETT. The statement of Gen. Lord did not include estimates of obligations then outstanding, either then or subsequent obligations.

Mr. GOOD. That is, the $14,500,000,000 did not?

Mr. GARRETT. It did not.

Mr. GOOD. But the statement of $18,500,000,000 included expenditures as well as outstanding obligations. Now, there is a difference of about $4,000,000,000. Of course, we did not have outstanding obligations on June 30 that will be necessary to pay $4,000,000,000. Many of these obligations were canceled without payment of anything, and some without the payment of very much.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman, of course, being the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is doubtless more familiar with that than am I. This is the statement given to us by an expert accountant employed by the committee, who investigated the books of the department, going through them very thoroughly. That statement was given to us by him, and he testified concerning it.

Mr. GOOD. Was that $14,500,000,000 given as the probable amount?

Mr. GARRETT. I can not say; nor did he say whether it was an estimated amount. He simply gave it to us under that head.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I intended to ask the gentleman just the question which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asked. But let me put it in this way: Was that $14,500,000,000 the amount that had been paid up to the 1st of September?

Mr. GARRETT. As I understand it, that purported to be the amount drawn from the Treasury, not paid necessarily, because money had been drawn from the Treasury and placed to the credit of disbursing officers at different points, according to my recollection of the testimony of Gen. Lord.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state what balance stands to the credit of the War Department to-day?

Mr. GARRETT. I can not. We have no evidence upon that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And those figures are inclusive of the period beginning on the day we entered the war up to the 1st of September?

Mr. GARRETT. From April 6, 1917, to September 1, 1919, and obligations outstanding as of September 1, 1919.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARRETT. These, I believe, are substantially the statements of fact justified from the records before this committee, and I am willing to submit to the deliberate and unprejudiced judgment of men on either side of this Chamber whether if I have correctly stated the facts—and I rest upon the record for my statement—there is justification for the imputation in this majority report of fraud. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It does not exist.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] correctly interpreted the purpose of bringing this report, which asks for no action on the part of the House, before this body for debate. He said, "We are not criticizing the officers and the men." There are officers and men connected with these settlements who saw service in France. But it will give an opportunity—that was the idea, though not his own words—to criticize the President of the United States and the Secretary of War.

Criticize the President of the United States? Certainly; you do not need a special rule to do that. [Laughter.] You have never needed any excuse to do that. All you have ever asked has been an opportunity [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Criticize the President of the United States? Why, that is characteristic. Did it every occur to you that since the Republican Party came into existence there have been five Democratic Presidents elected by the United States? One of them the Republicans themselves nominated and elected as Vice President, and he became President by reason of the death of the great Lincoln, and they impeached and sought to oust him from office. The next one who was elected by the people they stole it from. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The other three they have slandered while living and traduced when dead. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We had an instance of that a few months ago, when an effort was made to set aside a little plot of ground upon which to erect a monument to President Buchanan.

Criticizing the President of the United States? Why, he is accustomed to it; not only to criticism——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. In a moment. There have been Republican expressions of criticisms in clubrooms and cloakrooms and drawing-rooms and on the street compared to which the jibes of the guttersnipe are gracious compliments. But criticism is not all. Mr. Speaker, offensive curiosity and malignant hope forced a way into the sick chamber of the President under a pretense of performing public business, though every man knows, and the President himself knew, that the visitor went there for an inquisition of lunacy, with an order to return the writ within 48 hours. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And how disappointing it must have been for him to meet there a mind clear, untouched; a vision that still looked into the far future unclouded; and a will unbent, though he had suffered temporary defeat in his masterful effort for bringing about the peace of the world and stanching the flow of the blood of mankind. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And now the President has added insult to injury by walking! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Not just now.

Criticize the Secretary of War? Why, certainly. Did it ever occur to you that in every war of consequence in which this country has been engaged the Secretary of War has been a Democrat? It was so in the War of 1812, and in the War with Mexico. And Mr. Lincoln, in the very midst of the Civil War, called the great Stanton, the great Secretary of War, to his Cabinet. And it was so in the present war. The only Republican Secretary of War we had was during the Spanish-American War, Mr. Alger; and you remember that. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, do not misunderstand me. I disdain to make any intimation as to things that occurred during that administration, as charging Mr. Alger with any responsibility. No man of sense and intelligence would think for a single moment that he or the great and kindly McKinley were in any sort of way responsible for the food that was fed to the soldiers of this country in that war, and there is no political advantage to be obtained from it and none was obtained; and I tell you gentlemen now, you will derive none from this constant nagging. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARRETT. My time is very short.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Just a short question.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will not deny, will he, that in another body harsher criticism has been used of the President and the Secretary of War by members of the gentleman's own party than by members of the Republican Party?

Mr. GARRETT. I let the record stand for whatever it may be.

Criticize the Secretary of War! Not the officers and soldiers; no; the Secretary of War. Oh, gentlemen, do you realize in faint degree what the duties of the Secretary of War have been?

The Army of the United States which went to France in 1917 was the largest army, the best-fed army, the best-clothed army, the best-equipped army that ever assembled under the flag of this Republic. [Applause.]

Criticize the President and the Secretary of War! Mr. Speaker, the closing paragraph of the report of Gen. Pershing, the commander in chief of the American forces in France, is as follows:

> In closing this report, Mr. Secretary, I desire to record my deep appreciation of the unqualified support accorded me throughout the war by the President and yourself. My task was simplified by your confidence and wise counsel.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I entered upon the service required of this committee with extreme reluctance. I had some vision of the drudgery which it was to entail, but I accepted the responsibility because the minority leader asked me to do so. I have not at any time or any place—and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS] said the same of himself yesterday and said it truly—sought to inject into this matter the party spirit. I should be glad if I could be helpful in some constructive matter.

I wish to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that those honorable gentlemen with whom I have been associated in this gruelling work, these gentlemen of the majority, are capable of better things than hunting flyspecks. [Applause.] And I believe that in justice to my friends, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS], the steering committee, or whatever influence there is, should call off these efforts.

They have done everything they can. If there were anything there they would have found it. The War Department has been raked from end to end as with a fine-tooth comb. If they had found anything they would have brought it here before now, Mr. Speaker; and I suggest that they be relieved. They ought not to have imposed upon them the task of insulting their own intelligence as lawyers by a political exigency that requires them to bring in such a thing as this. [Applause.]

Give them an opportunity, sir! They are able men. Give them an opportunity to go at something that is constructive, and maybe they will be able to pull that side into performing something in these critical times for the good of the Republic.

I resent the imputation of fraud contained in this report. I resent it in the name of my party, one of whose members happens to have been the Secretary of War throughout these gruelling years of war. I resent it in the name of friends in that department, men of different political faith with whom I have come in contact, in whose integrity I have confidence.

I resent it in the name of the living millions of soldiers. I resent it in the name of the mothers of the soldiers who died in France and who "have their place in the warriors' heaven." You shall not, at least without my earnest protest and my feeble dispute, cause those grieved souls and bruised hearts to suffer more by untruthfully alleging that the administration under which they fought for their country was shot through with fraud. [Applause.] I challenge that statement and demand the proof. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I regret, but I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In view of the objection, Mr. Speaker, I now state that I do not desire to yield to any interruptions of any kind. I have considerable to say and I want to say it. And in doing so, gentlemen, I will have to ask your indulgence if I follow my notes quite closely. Facts have been called for, and I want to give them to you.

The majority of the committee, after its investigation of war claims, has arrived at the following conclusions:

1. The interests of the Government in many cases have not been sufficiently guarded in such settlements.

2. Certain rules have been adopted by the War Department Claims Board which, as administered, have had the effect of depriving the Government in many cases of large sums of money to which it is rightfully entitled.

3. Large sums of money have been allowed to various contractors on settlements through unfair salvage values for raw materials and special facilities furnished by the Government.

4. In numerous instances Government officials charged with responsibility have not exercised sufficient vigilance in the protection of the Government interests in such settlements.

It is the opinion of the subcommittee that the facts which have appeared in such investigations as this subcommittee has made are sufficient to not only justify, but make it highly advisable, that this subcommittee report to the said select committee the facts within its knowledge so that the same may be reported forthwith to the House of Representatives.

There were many sections of our statutory law applicable to the making of contracts by the War Department prior to the recent war. Among these was the act of July 5, 1884, providing that all contracts for supplies, and so forth, should be let to the lowest responsible bidder therefor. The act of March 2, 1901, provided that purchases of all supplies for the Army should be made only after advertising for bids. Section 3744, Revised Statutes, provided that every contract by the War Department should be in writing. The statutes also provided that each contracting officer must make affidavit attached to the contract that the contract was of no personal advantage to him, and that if he failed to do so he should be guilty of a misdemeanor.

On the 12th day of April, 1917, six days after the declaration of war, the Secretary of War made an order dispensing with advertising for bids for contracts, which order has been already referred to by Mr. JEFFERIS.

From that time until the end of the war the statute requiring advertising for bids was practically a dead letter. As the war progressed less attention was paid from time to time to the statutes above cited. Sometimes the necessary affidavits were made, and sometimes they seem to not have been made. Although thousands of contracts were entered into toward the end of the war, but little attention was paid to the formalities and hence thousands of these contracts were found to be informal and illegal. Some of them were not in writing; some of them consisted of telephone conversations; some of a letter or telegram, and contractual obligations were assumed mounting into hundreds of millions, where there was little or no legal evidence that any contract had been made.

This situation became such that on November 25, 1918, Comptroller Warwick, of the Treasury Department, wrote Secretary of War Baker a letter in answer to a letter of the Secretary of War dated November 21, 1918, and in which the comptroller stated that all of the contracts signed by proxy were illegal.

Following the decision of the comptroller, the so-called Dent Act was prepared and submitted to Congress, presumably under direction of the War Department, and which became a law on March 3, 1919. The principal provisions of this statute are in the report.

Prior to the passage of this act, and, in fact, almost immediately after the signing of the armistice, machinery was put in operation for the settlement of claims against the War Department. The system is a very complicated one. It has already been described. The system seems to have been that when a contractor desired to make a settlement he took the matter up with the officers who had previously had charge of the performance of contracts that had been suspended, and this officer then made a recommendation to the local board as to what he thought the settlement ought to be. The local board then passed upon the claims, and if they approved the recommendation it would be so indicated, and the report would then go to the zone supply officer and he would pass upon it, and if he approved it, then the report would be sent to Washington for review by the Director of Purchase. The evidence shows that this was the course during December, 1918, and January, 1919. Some time in January, 1919, the evidence shows there was organized in the War Department a central or superior board known as the War Department Claims Board, and this organization consisted of a member from each corps of the Army; for instance, one from the Purchase and Storage or Quartermaster, one from the Ordnance, and one from the Signal Corps, and several other officers, including a representative of the Director of Finance. This board was to lay down general policies.

As soon as the claims came in from the zone officer this Claims Board gave them consideration and either approved or disapproved them; then the claims would finally pass to the War Department Claims Board proper, but in so doing they would pass through a bureau board attached to each department in the War Claims Board proper. After the act of March 2, 1919, was enacted, practically the same machinery was used.

There was machinery of this kind used in the Ordnance and other departments in substantially the same way.

It will thus be seen that the initiation of the claim of the contractor was a claim filed by him and approved by the officer in the zone or district where he had been operating under his contract, and which officer had had charge of the formal negotiations with him, and who, in many cases, was the officer who had, in fact, made the contract with him.

Attached to each of the various boards and officials were a large number of so-called legal assistants and technical experts to whom it has been found by the subcommittee that references were made from time to time of particular parts of the subject matter of the claims. Very frequently these experts were men who came from the particular business interests involved in the settlement of the claim.

As a result of the system above outlined it is practically impossible to fix individual responsibility on any particular person where a contract has been settled in a manner not to the interest of the Government. Where the adjustment of the contract has gone through dozens of hands, in the end there is no individual responsibility, but the responsibility is scattered among dozens of individuals, any one of whom can evade responsibility by directing responsibility on the others. This is true in the settlement of such claims as the subcommittee has been able to investigate. Wherever it seemed that there might be responsibility attached to an officer for the award he might make in a particular instance, it was the opinion of the subcommittee that the testimony would show that some so-called expert adviser who was in the service of the Government had passed his judgment upon the matter and that this had been accepted by the officer under whose authority he was working. In the first instance, the original contracts were not signed by the officers who negotiated the contracts, but almost as soon as hostilities began officers were designated, by order of the War Department, whose only function was to attach their names to written contracts and make affidavit that they had no interest in the contract as the law required. By this method the officer who signed the contract, and who was usually a Regular Army officer, could make the affidavit that he had no personal interest in the contract, while, as a matter of fact, the officer who did in fact negotiate or advise the making of the contract was, in many instances, some one from civil life who was closely allied with the particular business interest involved in this or other similar contracts with the Government.

The subcommittee on ordnance has performed a great mass of work in attempting to investigate, even in part, the expenditures of the Ordnance Department. Although the select committee, immediately upon its appointment on June 18, 1919, requested of the War Department a list of all contracts entered into by the War Department of over $100,000 in face value, together with the aggregate amount of money expended on the same, it only received the final parts of this report on September 18, 1919. To further illustrate the difficulties under which the committee has labored, on June 18, 1919, the committee requested from the Secretary of War information as to the total amount expended by the War Department from the beginning of the war until June 1, 1919. An answer was given to this inquiry by the Secretary of War on June 23, 1919. Afterwards the committee ascertained through an accountant that the original answer given by the Secretary of War was erroneous, and that the amounts expended by the various branches of the War Department, as given by the Secretary of War, are off balance from $171,582.37 as a minimum, to $184,945,938.47 as a maximum.

In making the investigations we have attempted to make we have found also great trouble in ascertaining where the particular information may be found that the committee desires. Days after hearings had been had, and after the committee had requested all the papers, witnesses from the War Department would come to the committee with statements that there were certain papers that the committee had not seen that, up to that time, had been kept in the various district offices or elsewhere unknown to the committee.

Wherever the subcommittee has requested from the War Department specific information, such information has been given. However, in no instance has information been voluntarily proffered to the committee by the War Department, and hence the subcommittee has found it absolutely necessary to get what it gets by specific requests and after investigation, frequently outside of the department itself.

In about 50 per cent of the cases of informal contracts it has been possible for the War Department to adjust the suspension of these contracts without damages. Many contractors have shown a most commendable spirit of fairness in such settlements and have done everything they can to relieve the Government of additional financial burdens. And in many instances where exorbitant claims have been allowed the blame does not attach to the negotiating officers so much as it does to certain rules that have been adopted by the War Department Claims Board, which this subcommittee believes are unfair to the Government, and a spirit prevalent in the department to accede to the demands of the claimant rather than to vigilantly protect the financial interests of the Government.

Under the system adopted many civilians and commissioned officers of the War Department, and who possessed little, if any, knowledge of contracts or the construction thereof, and but limited knowledge of business and less concerning the construction of buildings and the manufacturing of complicated machinery, have been clothed with authority to settle and adjust procurement orders and contracts of uncertain meaning with contractors, and in so doing to transfer to such contractors valuable buildings, machinery, tools, and materials at a small percentage of the cost and value thereof.

Other claims involving the transfer of costly buildings, machinery, and materials have been settled by what is termed "negotiation," whereby the Government has permitted the contractor to retain the same at the price offered by the contractor, and without due consideration or ascertainment of the actual market value of the same.

In investigating the various matters it has not been possible to find anywhere a complete record of the transaction such as would be found in any court where a claim had been adjudicated, as will readily be seen by a reading of the hearings had by this subcommittee. There were private conversations by the various so-called technical experts and members of boards with each other and with various merchants and business men and with the claimants, as a result of which negotiations and talks and hearsay evidence claims were allowed and large sums of money paid. When it is attempted to ascertain the exact basis of these settlements no record is to be found and the investigator is forced to rely upon what some contractor or some Army officer says the facts were. Instead of the cumbersome, unwieldy, and unsatisfactory machinery now devised and in operation, if summary courts of claims had been established under order of the War Department, where every claimant would have been required to have produced his proof and where a record of the same had been preserved, the task of those who would revise such claims would have been made easy. But to-day, so far as this committee is concerned, and any other board, court, or committee that attempts to investigate any claims now being settled by the War Claims Board is concerned, such agency will be compelled to develop the facts by the calling of witnesses and by long and laborious research and investigation, and even then will be compelled to rely upon the memories of men who have perhaps long since left the service of the United States and have nothing to refresh their memories with.

Every settlement made under the act of March 3, 1919, is subject to review by either the War Department or a committee of Congress appointed for the purpose. In view of that situation, and while there is yet the opportunity to revise these settlements, if desired, the committee now reports the facts herein, so that the attention of Congress and the Secretary of War may be directed to these things. It is my deliberate judgment that the interests of the United States have not been insisted upon in many of these settlements as they should be. The remedy is not for this committee to apply, but the remedy must necessarily be applied by the War Department, under whose jurisdiction this machinery operates.

To illustrate many other settlements, the following specific instances are given. It is probable that the instances given are not extraordinary, but, rather, represent the rule, and are ones that happen to have come under the subcommittee's attention.

HENRY MOSS & CO.

The contract of Henry Moss & Co. was entered into in the latter part of September, 1918, and was for 195,000 branding irons. What tactician in the War Department engineered this purchase I fear will be unknown to fame. The committee was unable to learn his name. Altogether during the war and until after the armistice the War Department owned 580,182 horses and mules of all kinds, over 90,000 of which died. Evidently, with a branding iron for every three horses, the country ought to have been safe. There were four contracts, but no branding irons were delivered before the armistice. The contractor bought 79,952 pounds of copper to make these, for which he said he paid 39½ cents a pound. The specifications said cast copper. When he came to settle the Government made a chemical analysis of his copper on hand, found it impure, and hence only worth 11 cents per pound, and sold it back to him for that. Instead of penalizing him for not following specifications they allowed him full pay at 39½ cents per pound. There were 20,000 pounds more copper furnished than he needed, but this meant nothing. They bought it from him at 39½ cents and sold it back to him at 11 cents. The Government paid this firm about $40,000 in settlement, at least $27,000 more than he was entiteld to.

THE AMERICAN CAN CO.

This company took seven contracts to make 89,000,000 hard bread cans. The prices ranged from 5⅞ to 6½ cents each. Three independent can makers, with large manufacturing capacity, were trying to get contracts to make them at from 4 to 5 cents each, but the Government would not contract with them. The company delivered 49,738,608 cans. As has been said by Mr. JEFFERIS, tin plate had fallen in price but 9 per cent. This was admitted by the secretary of the company on the stand. In spite of this fact this company was permitted to keep this tin plate at 68 per cent of its cost price. At the same time, as is generally known, all sorts of tin products have risen in price. Every scrap of this material was no doubt used in the 55 factories of this company. An independent producer of tin plate, who had agreed to sell tin plate to the American Can Co. and who wanted to cancel his order on the armistice, was forced to deliver every pound. There was $867,732.37 worth of tin plate, and the Government lost on this tin plate $147,514.50 more than it ought to have lost. In addition, tools and machinery that cost the Government $165,705.56 was sold to this company at $35,695.47. The testimony showed that this machinery would readily last for 12 years of ordinary wear and was ordinary can-making machinery. We lost a quarter of a million dollars by this settlement.

STEIN BURN CAMP & FIELD EQUIPMENT CO.

This contractor had three contracts, one for fireless cookers, one for bread boxes, and one for cooks' chests. These were entered into about the last of August, 1918. The contractor delivered 66 fireless cookers, 25 cooks' chests, and 7 bread boxes. They cost us $171,687.06. This was the amount paid to the contractor in the settlement of his claim. The fireless cookers and cooks' chests were to be made of black steel sheets, the bread boxes of tin plate. The sheets required were all of standard material and sizes. The testimony of steel men and of Government experts—one a man who had been employed by Hibbard, Spencer & Bartlett for 40 years—was to the effect that the sheet steel was worth at the time, reasonably, 95 per cent of its cost price. The Claims Board let them take the sheet steel at the price of scrap iron and the tin plate at $20 a ton—plate which was worth on the market at least $140 a ton. A colonel on the Claims Board went to a metals expert attached to the board, a Mr. Birkenstein, of Chicago, a scrap dealer. Birkenstein told him there ought to be $25,000 come out of the claim. Then Stein came down and saw Birkenstein, and Birkenstein told the colonel about $2,800 would be right. And then they settled. The least inspection of this matter would convince anyone that this company received at least $114,051.91 more than they were entitled to.

NATIONAL ENAMELING & STAMPING CO.

This company had four contracts for boilers and kettles for rolling kitchens. They were made from September 7 to November 4. No completed articles were received by the Government on any of the contracts except the one for kettles, of which 8,000 were furnished after the armistice. This company has branches at various places in the United States, and issues a catalogue of 500 pages. It makes all kinds of materials made of tin plate and sheet steel. The contractor was permitted to keep the tin plate at approximately $35 a ton and the steel at $28 a ton. It is very probable that the Government lost by this settlement at least $27,000. One of these contracts also was made on November 4. Sufficient time did not elapse for him to get the material, but it was charged as if they were received, and allowed. Doubtless the contractor had stocks of tin on hand for its ordinary business.

The same was true of the American Can Co. The secretary of the company swore they had a service contract with the American Steel & Tin Plate Co., and that they simply ordered in advance for prospective orders. And yet on each contract they were allowed to charge for each contract as if the material had been ordered for that contract alone.

BRIAR HILL STEEL CO.

The Briar Hill Steel Co. is engaged in the manufacture and sale of steel products, billets, ingots, sheets, and the like. They had three orders for 776,600 sheets of corrugated steel roofing, dated about the middle of October. Nothing was ever delivered to the Government. It was allowed $164,519.86 in cash, and allowed to retain all the raw materials and special facilities. It had 9,267 gross tons of steel ingots on hand. These it charged to the Government at $48.17 a ton, and bought them back for $31.57 a ton. There was a large amount of corrugated sheet steel on hand. It offered $2 a hundredweight for this. A Government investigator sent a written statement to the board showing the market price of such sheets was $4.35 a hundredweight, and that $2 was entirely insufficient. Disregarding this, the material was sold to the company at $2 a hundredweight. The material was the very material needed by the contractor in its business. There can be little doubt that the Government lost in this settlement $75,000 approximately.

THE STANDARD STEEL CAR CO.

As has been said, this company contracted to build nine hundred and sixty-four 9.5-inch howitzer carriages. Although the Government prepared several contracts, they would never enter into one. Mr. GARRETT states that he will not enter into a discussion of this matter. I do not blame him. It is so permeated with fraud and corruption that I do not wonder that any defender of this administration would not care to discuss it. We did not receive a single carriage that we could use prior to the armistice. The War Department spent in this venture $18,582,428.88. After the armistice the Ordnance Department had them finish 200 of these carriages. The company placed in the record a statement that the cost of production of these carriages was about $23,000 each. At this rate the total cost of production was about $4,600,000. The balance of this vast sum, or about $14,000,000, was used in overhead and in building an immense plant, filled with costly machinery, all of which the contractor now has. The company was permitted to take buildings and machinery that cost $2,987,200 for $600,000, and materials that cost approximately $5,558,000 for $300,000. There was a bid for this latter material of about $700,000 from another reliable firm, which Col. E. S. Hughes, negotiating officer, concealed from his associates. The arsenals of the United States were clamoring for this raw material and machinery, but they were handed over to the contractor. There was fraud and bribery proved in some of the subcontracts, but all such accounts were allowed in full.

A member of the War Claim Board at Washington wired to know if the claim had been audited. He received an answer from a member of the Chicago board to the effect that it had. The answer was false. All this time the Government accountants were protesting against the allowance of it. The company stole a carload of small tools from this plant and removed them clandestinely to their own plant. The wonderful machine which they took from the Government as junk they are now sending to their subsidiary factories for use. The War Department, instead of following the usual course, sent a couple of men to Chicago, and there the whole affair was closed up speedily and safely for the company. It has been said by Mr. Garrett that the War Department was investigating this claim before we took a word of evidence. They had, and they stopped. The record shows that the chairman of the Chicago claims board had before that time written to the military intelligence telling them he wanted no further investigation of fraud. Col. Hughes wrote an order directing that no complete audit be made, at a time when such audit was about to be made. He also demanded that the Government auditors be taken out of the plant immediately after he had made his hurried settlement. The military intelligence officers had stopped work, owing to the attitude of the department. Then Mr. L. J. Blakey, a Government accountant, came to the committee with his story. We went to Chicago and took testimony. Then things began to move. In a few days after our return Mr. Garrett, of our committee, had a talk with the Secretary of War. Then Mr. Baker telephoned me that he was going to have some hearings and I could be present if I cared. What has been the result? A month has elapsed.

Blakey had been transferred first to the Aviation and then to the War Claims Adjustment Board at Washington, although he knows all about the Chicago work; Col. Hughes still is chairman of the Chicago board. Gentlemen, read the record; it stinks of corruption. I charge that Col. Hughes has violated the military code in many instances and ought to be court-martialed. Other officers and civilians associated with him are as bad. Bribery has been proved in the case. How many prosecutions has the Attorney General made? The Government has been defrauded of millions. What action has the Secretary of War taken? Just as much as he ever shall. Mr. Garrett says this company has not been heard. He knows that a subpœna duces tecum was issued at Chicago for the records of this company and that they would not produce them. I hope, gentlemen, you will read the record of this case.

JONES & LAUGHLIN STEEL CO.

This company had a contract, made in August, 1918, with the Government to erect 300 by-product coke ovens on the lands of the company at Pittsburgh, which were to take the place of old beehive ovens that the company had been using in its business of making steel. The Government was to take the toluol and ammonium sulphate for two years produced by these ovens and was to pay $1.50 a gallon for the toluol and $90 a ton for the ammonium sulphate. The contract estimated the production of toluol at 810,000 gallons a year and the ammonium sulphate at 24,000 tons a year. Nothing was produced, the ovens being about one-half completed when the armistice was signed.

The production of toluol was in the hands of a bureau in the Ordnance Department. The making of these contracts was opposed by experts from the Bureau of Standards and elsewhere, in the Ordnance Department, as unnecessary and improvident. However, they were made. The H. Koppers Co., a company making and building a by-product coke oven, began early to have a controlling influence in this department. About the time the contract was made the following persons were employed in the department: Capt. Horace C. Porter, in charge of toluene production and distribution. He was, from 1915 to the time he entered the War Department, chemical engineer of the H. Koppers Co., and during at least part of the time he was an officer was drawing a salary from the Koppers Co.

Lieut. Arthur R. Gray was the officer in charge of distribution; he, from 1915 to 1918, was purchasing engineer for the Koppers Co. Mr. H. P. Jellar, who had charge of investigations and efficiency studies of coke ovens, was, at the time of his entrance, superintendent of a by-product coke oven company, and left the department in January, 1919, to accept a position with the Donner Union Coke Corporation at $12,000 a year. Mr. C. J. Ramsberg was a technical expert in the toluene department; he was also vice president of the Koppers Co. He worked two days a week for the Government and four days for the Koppers people and drew a salary from both. Mr. H. B. Kirkpatrick was also a technical expert. He was an employee of the Koppers Co. and drew a salary from both the Government and the company. There was another technical expert named Engleman; he left the department to take a good position with the Birmingham Coke & By-Products Co. Of course, the Koppers ovens were used by Jones & Laughlin, and in most of the Government work.

When the contract of Jones & Laughlin was suspended, they filed their claim. Early in January some claims board men and by-product coke-oven people met in New York. They fixed a value on toluol at 17½ cents a gallon and on ammonium sulphate at $60 a ton; why, nobody knows. Then they settled with Jones & Laughlin, estimated their full production for two years, and gave them the difference between 17½ cents and $1.50 a gallon and $90 and $60 a ton. It amounted to $3,330,040.69. At the New York meeting a Maj. Falk had presented a chart in which he assumed to give what coke ovens ought to produce. The chart was wrong, mathematically and in fact. After the Pittsburgh board allowed the claim, some one called their attention to this Falk chart. They at once reopened the claim and gave them $345,946.31 more. Then the claim came to the Washington board and was referred to a technical expert, Maj. Frankforter, late of the University of Minnesota. He called their attention to the errors in the chart, and would not approve the claim. Just then the department found the contract with Jones & Laughlin was informal and that they must file another claim, which they did. Then, in order to avoid the facts and Maj. Frankforter's report, Col. Ayer issued Ordnance Circular No. 60, telling all claims boards that, although the Falk chart was wrong, they might use it if they wanted to, and then the Pittsburgh board, being duly authorized, reallowed the claim, which went through the Washington office and was duly paid.

The Falk chart was prepared by men in the department closely affiliated with the Koppers people. There is no doubt the Government was defrauded of vast sums of money in this settlement. Prospective profits were allowed, in violation of the Dent Act. If the Government had taken the two years' product under this contract instead of settling, it would have saved over a million and a quarter dollars. Anyone who doubts this can compute it easily from the facts. The War Department knows all this, and yet absolutely nothing has been done, and nothing will be done.

The report of the Secretary of War filed on the opening day of this session details approximately 5,000 claims that have been allowed by his machinery and approximately 4,700 that still remain unadjusted. Even the most casual examination of these claims will convince the investigator that the whole mass of claims should be reexamined and most of them readjusted. That this ought to be done goes without saying. And it seems to follow, as a logical sequence, that this ought to be done by some impartial semijudicial board whose personnel has had nothing to do with the former settlements.

When the United States entered the World War we were entirely and absolutely unprepared. Although the conflagration had been raging for over two and one-half years across the water, we had made no attempt to prepare for the day when it would spread to our side of the world. We had an administration of national affairs that was pacifist to the heart. The President not only consented to but apparently approved a national campaign in the heat of the war that was based upon the specious and misleading theory that he would keep us out of war if elected. His Cabinet was notoriously pacifist. The Congress, controlled by this administration, enacted no comprehensive measures for national defense. Such appropriations as were made for war supplies were in some instances not used for that purpose. There was information in the hands of those in executive charge of our affairs that gave them every notice that war was imminent. Yet when suddenly we found ourselves at war by a declaration of April 6, 1917, our weakness and lack of foresight became at once apparent. We had no aircraft, although we had known for years we must have them. We had no cannon, no shells, no small arms, no ships, no uniforms. Worst of all, we had no plans for anything. We did not know how to build guns or war machines and had no one to tell us how, except he came from across the seas. No trained personnel had been built up to do these things. For example, there were but three or four officers connected with the construction department and about 60 Ordnance officers of all grades in the Army in April, 1917. In such an emergency the administration adopted the policy of turning over to representatives of the producing and manufacturing interests of the country the planning, requisition, purchase, and prices of supplies for our military forces. The only preparedness this country had on April 6, 1917, was the preliminary organization through the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense of those who had things to sell which the Government would require during the war. From the time of our entrance into the war until its close, and even to this time, the business of buying and price fixing was not in the hands of the Government but in the hands of the producers.

I can not illustrate this better than with a statement of the copper situation during the war.

COPPER.

It was evident at the time of the entrance of the United States into the World War that large amounts of metallic copper would be needed, not only to supply the demands of the United States but as well to supply, in part at least, the needs of the nations allied with the United States in that war. This fact was also apparent even before April 6, 1917, when Congress passed the resolution declaring that a state of war existed. Copper enters largely into the making of munitions of war, and is especially an essential in the making of shells and projectiles of all calibers.

Prior to the declaration of war the War Department had failed to lay in any supply of copper for its prospective needs. In view of this situation the Government, in the production of copper for our war-time needs, was forced to rely upon the judgment and plans of those who had copper to sell. The facts disclose that from the very initiation of our attempts to procure and purchase copper for our war-time needs up to the time of the final disposition by the Government of its surplus stocks of copper after the signing of the armistice the situation as regards the production and sale of copper was entirely within the control of the copper producers. At no time was the Government a free agent in the purchase of such supplies.

On the 11th day of October, 1916, the President appointed an advisory commission to the Council of National Defense, which last-named body had been authorized by an act of Congress passed before that time. This advisory commission met first on the 7th day of December, 1916. Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, banker, was chairman of the commission.

These gentlemen, originally appointed as an advisory board, on February 12 adopted a resolution to the effect that a series of conferences be held with the leading men in each industry, so that the industries could organize themselves and deal through one man or a small committee. It will be seen from the facts hereinafter stated that the plan originally was—and which plan has been fully consummated in the subsequent proceedings—that the copper industry, as well as other producing industries, should be so centralized that it could be dominated and controlled by one man or a very small number of men, and that this control, once established over the industries, continued throughout the war, was the paramount influence toward price fixing and price control, and is one of the causes of high-priced commodities at this time. The plan of the Government was to centralize all industries irrespective of the result that might ultimately follow.

At the meeting last above noted, Mr. Baruch was given charge of raw materials, minerals, and metals, and it is manifest, among other matters, that he was in conference with the copper producers at the time of the declaration of war, a little less than two months afterwards. This is evident from the fact that about 10 days or 2 weeks before the President sent his message to Congress on April 2, 1917, Mr. Baruch and Mr. John D. Ryan were in conference at Washington and at that time arranged, evidently with the approval and after conference with the governmental authorities, a combination of copper producers and a sale to the Government of 45,000,000 pounds of copper at 16⅔ cents per pound. Mr. Tobias Wolfson, vice president of the United Metals Selling Co., and next to Mr. Ryan the principal official in that company, came to Washington on or about the 2d of April on telegraphic advice from Mr. Ryan, and at that time was advised by Ryan to take charge of the matter of arranging the sale aforesaid and to have the proper conferences with the copper producers interested to that end. It will thus be seen that before the declaration of war Mr. Baruch, chairman of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, and Mr. John D. Ryan, president of the United Metals Selling Co., had arranged a combination and consolidation of the copper producers for the purpose of selling copper to the Government through the United Metals Selling Co. Mr. John D. Ryan was president of the company. Its stock was owned by the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., of which Mr. Ryan was president also. The companies who thus united in the combination that authorized the United Metals Selling Co. to act as their agent were the Anaconda Copper Mining Co. and 26 other companies.

It is in testimony that the United Metals Selling Co. under this arrangement represented practically all the copper producers in the United States. This arrangement was known to the Government and agreed to by it, and in fact was arranged by officials then connected with the Government.

The purchase of 45,000,000 pounds of copper was completed and the same was allocated to the military and naval departments of the Government. Immediately thereafter, however, it became apparent that much larger quantities of copper would be needed.

The Government purchased during the war 592,258,674 pounds of copper, of which 523,338,735 pounds were purchased from the United Metals Selling Co., 66,846,000 from the American Smelting & Refining Co., 290,000 from the Cleveland Brass & Copper Mills, 800,000 from J. B. Wise, and 983,939 pounds from the Gorham Manufacturing Co.

In the three last-named instances the companies were not copper-producing companies but had stocks of metallic copper on hand which they sold to the Government. It has been heretofore mentioned that Mr. Baruch was appointed by the advisory commission to take charge of raw materials, minerals, and metals. Thereafter, and early in the year 1917, Mr. Baruch appointed a cooperative committee on copper, which consisted of the following-named persons: John D. Ryan, R. L. Agassiz, W. A. Clark, Murry M. Guggenheim, James McLean, Charles MacNeill, and Stephen Birch.

Mr. John D. Ryan, one of the cooperative committee, was in addition to his connection with the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., in practical control, through his company, of the Greene Cananea Copper Co. and the Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co., companies who were represented by the United Metals Selling Co., together with several other copper-producing companies. Mr. C. A. MacNeill, another member of this committee, was president of the Utah Copper Co., which, in turn, controlled the stock of the Nevada Consolidated Copper Co., both companies being in this combination, and was an officer in the Chino Copper Co., the Ray Consolidated Copper Co., the American Smelting & Refining Co., and the Wolverine Copper Mining Co., and others.

The Kennecott Copper Co. owns controlling interests in the stock of the Utah Copper Co. and the Braden Copper Mines Co., all controlled by the United Metals Selling Co., and which are in the group of mines ordinarily known as the Guggenheim interests. Mr. James McLean, another member of said cooperative committee, is a vice president of the Phelps-Dodge Corporation, was a director in the Greene Cananea Copper Co. and Old Dominion Co. Mr. Murry Guggenheim, another member of this cooperative committee, is an officer and stockholder in the Chili Copper Co. In addition to the above, the Guggenheim interests were heavily represented in the Braden Copper Mining Co. Mr. W. A. Clark, another member of this committee, in the United Verde Mining Co. and the Magma Copper Co.

It will thus be seen that every member of this cooperative committee was deeply interested in the copper industry and in the success of various properties owned or controlled in part by them. This was the committee whose function it was to assist in or advise as to the purchase of copper for the Government.

The committee above named was functioning after the first purchase of copper.

During the month of August, 1917, there was a very considerable discussion in Congress as to the propriety of the practice which it was thought was then prevalent of men attached to the various advisory committees of the Council of National Defense being intrusted with the purchase of supplies, in some cases from companies or interests in which they had a financial interest or were otherwise connected. As a result of an inquiry by the War Industries Board, on the 29th of August, 1917, the Attorney General directed a letter to Mr. Scott, chairman of the War Industries Board, in which he stated, in substance, that it was illegal for a person who was interested in the subject matter of a contract to enter into such contract on behalf of the Government.

Very shortly after the rendition of this opinion the various members of the cooperative committees that had been heretofore appointed by the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense began to tender their resignations. Section 3 of the so-called food control act evidently was aimed at the practice that had been theretofore indulged in and made it necessary for any members of companies interested to sever their connection with the Government service so long as the companies in which they were interested were contracting with the Government. On the 3d of October, 1917, the War Industries Board held a meeting, and at that time considered the matter raised by the opinion by the Attorney General and section 3 of the act of Congress aforesaid, and deliberated at considerable length on ways and means by which the effect of this act of Congress might be avoided by the appointment of committees to act for the various trades and industries represented, and by which the same result might be obtained as before.

Thereafter, on the 9th day of November, 1917, the director of the Council of National Defense stated, in a communication to the National Chamber of Commerce, that—> in order to prevent a continuance of the embarrassing situation wherein members of the committee were called upon to act as both Government agents or advisors and, at the same time, as representatives of their respective industries that these resignations have been accepted—and notified the National Chamber of Commerce to at once form committees to represent their industries which might deal with the Government. Thereafter, as a matter of fact, in most instances the former cooperative committees were continued, but were known as committees from the various trades and industries. There was no difference thereafter in the method of procedure. The copper cooperative committee resigned between September 19 and October 9, 1917. Up to the time that the cooperative committee on copper resigned all purchases of copper and negotiations relative to same were taken up through this committee.

It is in evidence, and conceded to be the fact, that the cooperative committee on copper practically controlled the companies that in turn controlled the price of copper in the United States, and it is further shown, especially by the testimony of Mr. Clarkson, director of the Council of National Defense, that because of the connection of these gentlemen with the Council of National Defense, and thereby with the Government of the United States, their authority was more coherent and their impact much greater in dealing with the other members of the copper industry, and that because of this official status they could more effectively control the price of copper than they could have done as individuals. As individuals they could not have coordinated the entire resource of copper in the country as well as they could do when officials. In other words, by virtue of their official standing all producers of copper could be compelled to pool their interests.

In the matter of the production of copper, as in all other industries and trades, the various cooperative committees who were appointed were selected not by the Government but by the respective trades and interests, and, as naturally would be expected, these gentlemen had in mind the condition of their various trades and were supposed and expected to represent them in their various transactions with the Government. On the other hand, on the part of the Government, there was no one who knew anything about the various trades or interests involved, excepting in the most casual and fragmentary way, and this condition continued to a very considerable extent throughout the entire war and certainly throughout the war so far as the purchases of copper were concerned.

As soon as the arrangement was made with the Government by the cooperating copper companies through the common agent, the United Metals Selling Co., four things were accomplished: First, all competition was eliminated; second, all expense of selling and finding a market was eliminated; third, the possibility of all loss from bad accounts was eliminated; fourth, the market was absolutely under the control of the American producers of copper.

While the United Metals Selling Co., in its inception, did not represent all the copper producers in the United States, this apparent difficulty in the organization was obviated as the result of an action of the War Industries Board early in 1917. Mr. Baruch, a member of the War Industries Board, appointed one Eugene Meyer, jr., as his representative, and who in turn requested all copper producers to arrange for a copper producers' committee. Mr. Meyer at that time had large copper investments and was heavily interested in the business. In this matter he was acting as a member or agent of the War Industries Board. On September 28, 1917, he came to the copper producers and asked them to appoint a committee which would represent all the copper companies, not only those represented by the United Metals Selling Co. but all other companies. That meeting was held at 120 Broadway, and there were present at the meeting the following persons:

Joseph Clendennin, Charles Earl, S. S. Rosenstamm, L. Vogelstein, Julius Loeb, Julian Beatty, M. H. Crego, T. Wolfson, Sidney Jennings, Charles Nichols, W. Parsons Todd, G. W. Drucker, James McDonald, H. M. Brush, and Eugene Meyer, jr.

There were no Army officers at this meeting. It is not known exactly what happened at this meeting, but the question of furnishing copper to the Government was fully discussed. On the 21st of September, 1917, Mr. Robert S. Lovett, acting chairman of the War Industries Board, wrote a letter to Mr. John D. Ryan, at New York, in which Mr. Lovett stated as follows:

> Dear Sir: I am pleased to advise you that the President has approved the oral agreement as to copper arrived at by the War Industries Board and the copper interests represented by you and which is correctly set forth in the following statement made public by the President.

The second purchase of copper made by the Government from the United Metals Selling Co. was on the 15th day of October, 1917, after the President had approved of the new price, and was a purchase of 11,595,346 pounds at 23½ cents per pound, or an increase of approximately 6.84 cents per pound. No reason appears in the record for this increased price. The price of 23½ cents per pound was continued in effect until June 15, 1918, when further increase of price was made to 26 cents per pound.

The War Industries Board, appointed by the Council of National Defense, ceased to function early in the spring of 1918. On the 4th of March the President wrote to Mr. Baruch appointing him chairman of a war-industries board, and in this letter of appointment gave him power by implication to fix prices. This War Industries Board was fully established on May 29, 1919, although it had been functioning practically since the 4th of March preceding the date of appointment by the President. From that time forward the War Industries Board was not under the control of the Council of National Defense, but was a body functioning by itself.

The price fixing of copper, as well as many other commodities, was in the beginning fixed by the cooperative committees appointed by the advisory Council of National Defense. This was particularly true of copper. Following the resignations of these various committees, the function of purchasing and price fixing was continued by the War Industries Board, appointed by the Council of National Defense, and particularly through Mr. Baruch, a member of that board. This continued until the spring of 1918, when the War Industries Board was organized as a separate entity, and of which, as has been said, Mr. Baruch was chairman. After the appointment of this presidential War Industries Board, certain committees were appointed by the board to have charge of various industries and productions. Almost at once there was appointed by Mr. Baruch what was called a nonferrous metals section. This section had charge of, among other things, copper. Its personnel was Pope Yeatman, chief; E. C. Thurston, assistant; Andrew Walz, assistant. From the time of the appointment of Mr. Yeatman and his section it was not permitted to place an order relative to copper except through him. A clearance from Mr. Yeatman was a prerequisite to such an order. Mr. Yeatman was a mining engineer, and at the time of his appointment was working for the Guggenheim interests, and was drawing $100,000 a year salary from them for this service in their mining interests. He left this position and was serving the Government for $1 per year, at which employment he continued until immediately after the armistice, when he left the Government service and went back to his original employment.

During the year 1918, Mr. Yeatman, under the direct supervision of Mr. Baruch, had complete charge of the copper situation in the United States.

During the period of the war the business of selling copper to the Government was conducted by Tobias Wolfson, vice president of the United Metals Selling Co., and by a Mr. Mosehauer, who was located at Washington, and who was the representative of the United Metals Selling Co. and the American Smelting & Refining Co. An arrangement had been made between these two companies by which the American Smelting & Refining Co. was to handle all copper for export, and the United Metals Selling Co. was to handle all copper for domestic use. They were, however, both represented by the same Washington representative, as above stated.

During the entire period of the war the uncontradicted testimony shows that the Ordnance Department and its officers had nothing to do with the fixing of prices on copper, and the Army officers in what they did simply followed Executive orders in that regard, and followed the directions of civilians in the War Industries Board or other price-fixing bodies constituted from time to time. As to the prices, the representatives of the Ordnance Department had no negotiations at all.

After the signing of the armistice it was determined that there was approximately 100,000,000 pounds of copper in the hands of the War Department that could be counted as surplus copper and was not needed by the Government for war purposes, and it was evident that some disposition must be made of it, either by a sale of it to the public generally or in some other manner.

On February 5, 1919, Mr. Mercer, chief of the raw materials and scrap division of the director of sales office, addressed a letter to Mr. E. C. Morse, assistant director of sales, in which he stated as follows:

> It would be my recommendation that Mr. Hare, or some one whom he might delegate, have a conference with Mr. Ryan, and any other representative of the copper interests, that we may arrive at some plan of distribution in accordance with the plan outlined in the correspondence which you handed me as passing between Mr. Ryan, Secretary Baker, Mr. Hare, and Gen. Williams.

It appears from this letter that before that time Mr. Ryan, Secretary of War Baker, Mr. Hare, director of sales, and Gen. Williams, Chief of Ordnance, had had a conference and had arranged upon some plan for selling the excess copper. The exact nature of that correspondence is not disclosed by the record and was not produced by the witnesses testifying on that subject. Prior to this time, however, and early in January, it was evident that the Government would have a surplus of copper, and the representatives of the United Metals Selling Co. approached the Secretary of War, asking that all copper be held off the market for at least six months, basing its request upon the proposition that during the months of November and December they had continued production paying a wage rate corresponding to 26-cent copper, and had an enormous surplus, and that reports from abroad were pessimistic as to a possibility of immediate sales.

The sales department then arrived at a policy as to this copper, which was to the effect that the copper would not be dumped upon the market, but that it should be the policy of the Government to absorb as much of the surplus as was possible in the War Department itself by sale or transfer to other War Department bureaus, other governmental departments, and semigovernmental commissions, and that every precaution should be taken to avoid the disturbance of the industry of the copper producers. About the time the negotiations were being had with the copper producers, representatives of the United Metals Selling Co., certain conferences were called in the Department of Labor between the representatives of the copper miners and representatives of the Government and representatives of the copper producers. These conferences were held the last week in January, 1919. The official report shows that on the 30th day of January, 1919, the conference of mine workers requested the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to cooperate with the producing and consuming industries to the end that a way of handling their stocks may be found to remove the existing lack of confidence in the market and that the methods thus determined upon shall be rigidly enforced by the officers of the respective departments. The resolutions requesting this action were signed by 30 representatives of the copper miners. At that time wages were being paid on a war basis, and it was feared that if a return was had to low prices on a sliding scale the wages of the workmen would be greatly reduced. At about this time or a little afterwards, also, it appears that there was a conference between Mr. Ryan and the Secretary of War, in which Mr. Ryan impressed on the Secretary of War what was said to be the demoralized condition of the copper industry, and asked the Secretary of War to use his discretion in disposing of this copper in order that this demoralized condition would not be made worse, and that the situation be taken up with the copper producers to see if some mutually agreeable way could not be worked out whereby the condition would be helped as much as possible, and the Government dispose of its surplus. It is probable that even before this time the Government had been in communication with the copper producers relative to the sale of this surplus.

Almost as soon as a director of sales was appointed, Mr. John D. Ryan sent Mr. Wolfson as his agent to Washington, directing him to have a conference with Mr. Hare, the director of sales, and to show to Mr. Hare what effect the surplus copper was having on the copper market. In pursuance of this direction, Mr. Wolfson came to Washington and saw Mr. Hare on February 13.

On the same date a meeting was called in the office of the director of sales, Mr. Hare, in the Munitions Building, at Washington, and at which meeting there were present certain representatives of the office of the director of sales and of the United Metals Selling Co.

A smaller conference was had within this conference, as shown by the official minutes, at which were present Col. Boggs, Col. Lehman, Col. Tenney, Capt. Mercer, Mr. Morse, Mr. Wolfson, and Mr. Bancker, who prepared certain principles which were to be the method of procedure of the Government in the sale of this surplus copper, the second of these principles being—

> It is felt that it would be to the best interest of the War Department, the producer, and the laboring class to have the War Department surplus copper and brass marketed by the producers, or some agency under their control, the marketing to be at the same price as similar material that they may sell during the same period.

The minutes also show the following:

> The representatives of the copper industry were to go back and see their principals, get together all the copper producers, and present these principles to them, returning as soon as possible for further conference with the War Department representatives with a definite proposition.

On the 14th of February Mr. Hare, director of sales, notified Mr. Wolfson, of the United Metals Selling Co., of the action of the conference and requested him to at once call the principal producers of copper throughout the country together—

> To discuss among themselves the terms upon which they will be willing to handle for the War Department the sale of surplus copper and brass now in the hands of that department.

Thereafter there were two conferences of copper producers held in New York, one on February 20, 1919, and one on March 3, at which all the copper producers were represented.

At these conferences it was arranged for the copper producers to take over the surplus copper of the Government, and on April 10, 1919, a formal written contract was entered into between the War Department and the United Metals Selling Co., by which 100,000,000 pounds of electrolytically refined copper was sold to that company on the following terms:

First, the price was to be the monthly average New York price for electrolytic copper as quoted by the Engineering and Mining Journal of New York, with lesser prices for copper not in commercial shapes and scrap copper. Second, the price was to be determined on the 5th day of May and on the 5th day of each succeeding month. Third, the price was to be paid on or before the 15th day of the second month for each month's quota. Fourth, a deduction of 1 per cent also would be made from the price to cover storage, and so forth. Fifth, the copper also would be delivered by the United States, with all expenses of loading and freight to be paid by the Government. Sixth, the copper was to be delivered 5,000,000 pounds per month, beginning with April, 1919, with the further arrangement that if the producers of copper represented by the purchaser in any one month up to January, 1920, should sell more than 50,000,000 pounds of copper, and from February, 1920, to June, 1920, more than 100,000,000 pounds, in such event the amount of 5,000,000 pounds per month should be increased by an amount equal to 20 per cent of the excess over 50,000,000 and 100,000,000 pounds, respectively.

The signing of the armistice created in the copper market, as in all other markets in the United States, a serious depression and stoppage of trade. The 26-cent price of copper continued automatically in effect until December 5, 1918. From that time up until practically the signing of the contract with the United Metals Selling Co. there was no market for copper. During December and January there were no sales being made of any kind. From February 1 up to July 30 the prices of copper were as follows: February 1, 1919, the Journal gives the prices at 18⅜ cents; February 15, 16¾ cents; March 1, 14¾ cents; March 15, 14⅛ cents; April 1, 15.35 cents; April 15, 15.15 cents; May 1, 15.35 cents; May 22, 16.35 cents; June 2, 16.35 cents; June 16, 17⅜ cents; July 1, 19 to 19.10 cents; July 15, 21.30 to 21.90 cents; July 30, 22.85 to 23.35 cents.

It will be observed from these quotations that from April 1 the approximate date of the contract with the United Metals Selling Co. for the Government surplus copper, copper increased until on July 30 it had risen to 23.35 cents, or 8 cents per pound, while from February 1 to March 15 it had fallen close to 4 cents per pound. The immediate effect of the sale of copper to the United Metals Selling Co. and the control of the copper market by this company was to stabilize the market and to increase the price.

That this was the intent of the Government agents and the copper producers there can be no doubt. In addition to the testimony of Mr. E. C. Morse, hereinbefore noted, his testimony shows that no minimum price was agreed upon in the contract with the copper producers, because to fix such a minimum price would be to depress the price. Mr. Morse also testified that the sale of copper was negotiated with the copper producers in this way for the purpose of keeping the market stable and not disturbing it, and disposing of the Government surplus as rapidly as possible.

It is the uncontroverted testimony that about the time conferences were initiated between the copper producers and the Secretary of War the director of sales issued an order directing that pending these negotiations no copper be sold by the War Department to any person. This order was as follows:

FEBRUARY 7, 1919.

Director of sales, Order No. 8.
Subject: Sale of copper and brass.
1. No further sales of either copper or brass, as new material or as scrap, are to be made under any circumstances until further notice.
By authority of the Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic.
C. W. HARE, Director of Sales.

This inhibition against the sale of copper continued until after the contract was made with the United Metals Selling Co. for the Government surplus copper, and then, on April 18, the director of sales made an order permitting the sale of copper.

Mr. A. G. Peter, secretary of the committee having charge of the disposal of copper for the Ordnance Department during that period, testified that if he had been permitted he could have sold at least part of the copper of the Government at the market price during that time; as a matter of fact many offers were had for the Government copper, but owing to the order of the director of sales none could be sold. The object of the sale to the United Metals Selling Co. and the holding of the same off the market is well indicated by the testimony of Maj. L. R. Quinn, of the Ordnance Department, and who stated that the sale was to keep the market from being depressed; in other words, that the price of copper on the market should not go lower.

Mr. Wolfson said on this subject:

It was essential to get it out of the way, or we thought it was better that it be handled through the same channels that sold the copper. It did not matter whether it was sold by us or not, so long as it was gotten out of the way. We felt so long as that hung over the market there would be no stability. * * * I found I could not do any business with this hanging over the market.

Under the contract for the sale of copper the base price fixed on May 5, for the month of April, was 15.246 cents per pound; on June 5, for the month of May, it was 15.864 cents per pound; and on July 5, for the month of June, it was 17.61 cents per pound. In April the United Metals Selling Co. sold 83,000,000 pounds of copper, and hence took on their contract 13,000,000 pounds of Government copper at the average April price. During the month of May there was sold by the United Metals Selling Co. 207,649,189 pounds of copper, and accordingly there was taken by the United Metals Selling Co. of Government copper on June 5, for the month of May, 3,652,837 pounds. Practically the entire balance of the surplus copper to be taken by the United Metals Selling Co. under this contract was taken on July 5 on the average June price.

On the signing of the armistice the copper producers, represented by the United Metals Selling Co., had on hand approximately 750,000,000 pounds of copper aside from the purchase of the Government surplus copper, so that the price at which the Government surplus copper was sold to the consumers regulated not only the price of such copper as was being produced at the mines but also the price of approximately 750,000,000 pounds of other copper already on hand.

The profits of the copper producers from their negotiations with the Government during the period of the war, and in the purchase of the surplus copper after the war was over, were enormous, and it must have been apparent to the Government agents that such was the case. It is said that the high prices paid for copper were paid for the purpose of stimulating production. However, the facts do not seem to indicate that it was necessary to pay as great a profit as was paid to accomplish that purpose. It has also been said in defense of the price fixing by the Government and its other negotiations that the market price of copper was approximately 32 or 33 cents per pound when we entered the war, and that the price fixing by the copper producers was far below what they might have obtained on the open market. However, it will be remembered that the copper producers were at the mercy of the Government at that time, and that under section 8 the act of August 10, 1917, the food-control act, the Government had the right at any time to commandeer the mines and to practically fix its own price on copper.

Two methods of computation were used by the committee in ascertaining the cost of producing copper: One was in the examination of such reports of the copper companies as were available to accountants for the committee; the other was a report of the Federal Trade Commission made to the War Industries Board, and a copy of which was before the committee. This last-named document, confidential when received but now a public document, had evidently gone through the hands of the price-fixing committee of the War Industries Board, and this committee was fully conversant with the situation and the profits being made by the copper companies, as appears by their marginal notes upon the original copy. The custodian of these files produced the same, and from the marks made upon it, supposedly by the price-fixing committee, it appears that that committee knew that the profits being made by most of the principal producers in the United Metals Selling Co. combination were making, at a price of 23½ cents per pound, from 8 to 12 cents per pound profit. These marginal notations show that of the whole list of copper producers whose records were examined by the Federal Trade Commission the net profits at 23½ cents per pound were from 12 to 4 cents a pound, and that the principal companies in the United Metals Selling Co. group, and in which Mr. Ryan and the members of the cooperative committee on copper were most intimately interested, were from 8 to 12 cents per pound. Mr. Melville C. Wooster, chief accountant of the Federal Trade Commission, testified that the average cost of production of all the companies within the United Metals Selling Co. group for 1917 was 13.618 cents per pound, and in 1918, 15.326 cents per pound. In 1917 the cost of production per pound in the Utah Copper Co. was 10.4 cents, and in 1918, 12.3 cents. The cost of production in the Calumet & Hecla Mining Co. in 1917 was 12.9 cents, and in 1918, 15.7 cents. The cost of production in the Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co. in 1917 was 11.3 cents, and in 1918, 11.7 cents. The cost of production in the Kennecott Copper Co. in 1917 was 12.4 cents, and in 1918, 18.7 cents. It is useful to notice also that of the four companies last above named each one, except the Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co., reported a decreased production for 1918; and from their reports it is evident that these companies were mining their lower-grade ore and making their mines ready for a time of higher prices, when higher-grade ore might be produced at a lesser expense.

To illustrate the profits made during this period by some of the copper companies, four instances are cited:

The Utah Copper Co. in 1917 made a profit of $32,600,000, which was 200 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918 a profit of $24,750,000, which was 150 per cent of its capital stock. The Calumet & Hecla Mining Co. in 1917 made a profit of $9,500,000, or 800 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918, $3,500,000, or 300 per cent of its capital stock. The Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co. in 1917 made a profit of $12,260,000, or 55 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918, $9,250,000, or 40 per cent of its capital stock. The Kennecott Copper Co. in 1917 made a profit of $11,826,000, or 70 per cent of its capital stock, and in 1918, $9,390,135.90, or 60 per cent of its capital stock. It is probable that other companies in the list made similar profits, but the exact information is not available without a careful and detailed audit of the books of these various companies.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have but very little time.

Mr. HICKS. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman if the figures he has given are net profits.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have given the profit per pound of 8 to 12 cents; this was net; that is my understanding of it.

Now, these companies represented in this consolidation, of course, were mostly low-priced producing companies. Let me tell you something else. The remarkable thing about this is that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and the administration and the people who defend it say that they had to make this price to make a profit for the high-cost producing mines, and therefore the mines that had a low cost of production necessarily made more profit. As a matter of fact, all the figures we had available, taken from the reports of the company, show that this price had this effect on copper—that it reduced the production notwithstanding the increase in price. In 1918 three of the four big copper companies, of which we had the figures for production, were companies mining a low-grade ore, that is, a cheap ore, and they were doing it while the price was low in order when the price became high that they could manufacture high-grade ore and get a higher price. So the effect of the proposition was to feed this infernal trust which had its fingers on the throat of the country and let them make such inordinate profits as were entirely unjustified by the needs of the Government. There was no necessity for it, and the Government with its strong hand at the throttle could have commandeered all the copper it needed and made them furnish it at reasonable prices.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have but little time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did the committee investigate the purchase of food products by the Government?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Not this branch of the committee; that was done by subcommittee No. 4. Let me say that I find it necessary in order to get the facts before the House and the country to hereafter file a written report. I have conferred with a portion of my committee, and some time in the future the committee is going to give the detailed facts, the specific facts that we can not do now because we have been limited by objections from the Democratic side of the House. We want to file them so that the country can have the benefit of the information that this committee with six months of the hardest work I ever did in my life has collected. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman will confer with the other portion of the committee, I suppose?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will; but I do not know what good it will do if you assume the same position you have about this.

The profits made by the copper producers out of the purchase by them of the surplus copper of the Government after the armistice would be hard to compute. It is certain that if this 100,000,000 pounds of copper had remained in the hands of the Government or had been sold by the Government to retailers or to the consumer the price of copper would have remained at least stationary. However, by its purchase the producers were enabled, by their combination and by the allocation of business among them as they chose, to control the market absolutely, and being permitted by the Government to combine and pool their interests the market immediately turned and started upward. Even in the matter of the contract itself it is evident that the copper producers were buying on the 5th of May, June, and July large sums of copper at a price that was the average price for the month before and on a constantl, rising market, so that any margin there might be in price, by way of an increase, would accrue to the copper producers and be lost to the Government. Just what this loss to the Government would be could only be ascertained by careful computation. In addition the copper producers were given 1 per cent of the cost as a condition of the trade. In addition every pound of the approximately 200,000,000 pounds of copper a month they were selling had an added value given to it by the rising market which the copper producers were creating. It is reasonable to assume that if, during the period the copper producers were taking the Government copper, their aggregate sales were 600,000,000 pounds, including the Government copper, their profit by virtue of the increase in price was approximately $50,000,000.

Not all the copper producers shared equally in these profits, it is true. Mr. John D. Ryan, in the first purchase of copper by the Government from the United Metals Selling Co., dictated the proportion which each company in that combination should furnish the copper, and this schedule or percentage obtained throughout the war. The same was true in the allocation of the surplus copper purchased from the Government. Some companies, and these were so far as can be seen usually the low-cost production mines, furnished most of the copper. An example of this will be found in the group of mines represented by Mr. John D. Ryan. The United Metals Selling Co. originally represented a small group of mining companies, 13 in number, and to these companies were allotted 152,500,287 pounds. Of this amount there was allotted to the Ryan companies—the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co.—121,615,919 pounds.

At the time the first sale of copper was arranged at 16⅔ cents per pound, many statements were circulated through the press of the country relative to the very excellent and patriotic work that had been done in this negotiation. The effort was then made to show that because this price was greatly below the average market price, that thereby the Government had made an immense saving and that the copper producers had patriotically turned over the production of their mines to the public for war purposes.

Scribner's Magazine for August, 1917, contained an extensive article entitled "What the Council of National Defense is and What it has Done," by Grosvenor Clarkson, secretary of the Council of National Defense and of the advisory commission. On page 190 is the following:

> * * * Mr. Baruch first announced his presence in the tremendous task of mobilizing American industry by procuring 45,000,000 pounds of copper for the Army and Navy at about half the current market price, saving the Government in the neighborhood of $10,000,000.

A fair and candid résumé of the whole situation can not fail to convince the reader that the arrangement thus entered into was one extremely favorable to at least a few of the copper producers, and that from this arrangement, and because of the necessity and demands of the Government during the war, those who operated these copper producing properties were enabled to make and did make extravagant and extraordinary profits.

During the progress of the war the people were continually reminded of the necessity of contributing liberally to the support of the Government. They were urged to buy bonds and war-savings stamps to the limit of their capacity and to practice every economy in food and clothing. It is a matter of pride to contemplate how fully the people responded to that request. The savings of the mechanic, the profits of the farmer, the mite of the widow, the pennies of the children, were freely and cheerfully given, with the high and sacred intent to thus advance the cause of our country. I stood one day in the mud in a ruined town in northeastern France and saw a division of American boys go past through the mist toward the battle out yonder that awaited them. I could hear the guns thumping and pounding in front, and over us soared aeroplanes, like monster locusts. There was no pomp and panoply about this. It was somber and serious business. As I looked at these young, healthy, clear-skinned boys, with the sacred fire of youth in them, they who had so much to live for, I thought of the supreme sacrifice they were making for their country. What the rest of us did was, as compared to this, a mere bagatelle, my countrymen. [Applause.] There was no thought of profits or gain or per cents or personal returns. It was a pure and unselfish dedication of all they had to the country that has gained much credit in this old world of ours, my colleagues, by having given them birth. And it does irk me exceedingly when I think of the economies and sacrifices of our people, when I remember what I saw in Flanders and in France, to observe a careless disregard of the public rights and an ignorant and apparently willful waste of public funds. Every cent we have must be carefully conserved. The times cry for the most stringent economies. We must not save our country only to see it become a bankrupt. It is the duty of every right-thinking man to guard in every possible way the public purse, and it matters not whether he be a member of a Claims Board or a Member of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Now that we have had four hours of general debate, what has been accomplished and what can we do?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement heretofore made, the Clerk will call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

CERTAIN GRAZING LANDS IN UTAH.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3016) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1018) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection until I can make a statement?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I withhold the objection for a moment.

Mr. GANDY. I just want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and to the House that the Senate bill 1018 is in identically the same language as a bill that has already passed this House at this Congress, and which has gone to the Senate. The House having passed his identical bill, and there is not the difference of the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," I hope that my friend will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I had this morning, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, a delegation of men from the reservation who are particularly concerned in this measure, and they stated that they would have a delegation here shortly after the first of the year to present facts concerning this bill. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that the bill retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next bill.

WATER SUPPLY FOR MISCELLANEOUS PURPOSES ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 796) for furnishing water supply for miscellaneous purposes in connection with reclamation projects.

The SPEAKER. Is there objecton?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I withhold my objection for a moment.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, it seems quite imperative to a lot of people that this bill should pass. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts, whose purpose is to make an objection, has not investigated the question so that he is in full possession of the merits of the proposition. This is simply to afford the reclamation people the legal right to dispose of some surplus water. I have in my office a letter, which I received within a week from a State senator of my State, asking for the passage of this bill. He tells me in that letter that he has been operating a sawmill within 400 yards of a ditch of the reclamation people; that he has expended $2,000 trying to get water for his sawmill by digging wells on a reserve where all of the water was taken by the reclamation people. He could not get water, and the only way that he can get it is to haul it in barrels from the ditch, if the reclamation people would permit him to haul it. It seems unreasonable that the Government should not be permitted to sell its surplus water to people under these circumstances.

The bill is safeguarded, I think, by providing that the funds shall go into the Reclamation Service of the particular project. There are some months in the year when the water can not be used for irrigation or for any other purpose. It simply runs to waste to the sea. If it could be utilized by the men who have sawmills or sugar-beet factories, or who want to put alfalfa in silos, the Reclamation Service would get that much money for it, and it might as well obtain it and put it to the credit of the people who are paying for that service. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the advantages which the gentleman states will come to certain individuals if we embark on this policy, but I submit that this is not a wise policy to embark upon in connection with the reclamation projects, and, therefore, I object.

CONFERRING CITIZENSHIP UPON CERTAIN INDIANS, ETC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 288) for the purpose of conferring citizenship upon Indians, segregation of Indian tribal property, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman in charge of the bill does not seem to be here, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMITTING MINORS TO MAKE HOMESTEAD ENTRY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1729) permitting minors of the age of 18 years or over to make homestead entry or other entry on the public lands of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, just why are minors given this right? Is it because of a purpose to aid soldiers and sailors?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no one here who can answer the question, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

ERECTION OF FEDERAL OFFICE BUILDING IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 484) to provide for the erection of a Federal office building on the site acquired for the Subtreasury in St. Louis, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman desires to make a statement, I withhold the objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, let me make this statement: This bill is reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Some time ago a bill was reported and passed and is now law authorizing the construction of a Federal building in St. Louis upon land purchased and owned by the Government, but the law authorizing the construction of that building provided for the building of fireproof vaults for use of the Subtreasury at St. Louis. I think it is pretty well conceded now, since the location of the Federal reserve bank in St. Louis, that it will not be long until there will be no occasion for a Subtreasury there, and during the remainder of the time that the Subtreasury is in operation it can continue to do business in the building in which it is now located. This bill simply seeks to amend the bill heretofore enacted by striking out the paragraph in the original act which provided for the expenditure of money for the construction of fireproof vaults, so that money may be saved and the space intended originally for use of the Subtreasury may be used to house other governmental activities. This bill does not involve the expenditure of an additional dollar.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Unless the present bill under consideration is passed the money which the gentleman seeks to have available to expend for a public building to be used for purposes other than the Subtreasury could not be expended?

Mr. RUCKER. There has already been, as I understand from recollection, something like $200,000——

Mr. BLANTON. But by this bill it will permit the expenditure of how many other thousands of dollars?

Mr. RUCKER. The entire amount appropriated for the construction of the building.

Mr. BLANTON. It is $600,000, is it not?

Mr. RUCKER. Probably that amount.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, by keeping this bill from passing we can keep that $600,000 in the Treasury, can we not?

Mr. RUCKER. But the gentleman should bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that by the passage of this bill we will provide housing capacity for a great many governmental activities now housed in rented property. It is a saving in annual rental which the Government is now paying of something like $35,000 or $40,000.

Mr. BLANTON. There are 30,000 people in the city of Ranger, Tex., who are getting their mail in a little old shack that——

Mr. RUCKER. The building authorized in this bill is not a post office, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand it is for governmental purposes, and if we are going to build emergency buildings we ought to build them in these emergency places.

Mr. RUCKER. We will take care of that very soon. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman allow me to state in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas that under existing law the Treasury Department is now authorized to proceed to erect the building as provided by law? It is only held up to save money.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I feel the influence of the yuletide, and I want to be gracious, especially to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, and I have felt so gracious that I have promised my friend from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] that until January 5 I am not going to make any more points of order of no quorum. [Applause.] So that the fellows can go home whenever they want to do so. But this calls for an expenditure of a big sum of money which but for the passage of the bill can not be expended.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is mistaken, the money is now available.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do not they expend it?

Mr. DYER. The Secretary of the Treasury feels that this money for vaults should be saved to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. So the purpose of the bill is to permit the money to be spent in a building for purposes other than the Subtreasury?

Mr. DYER. No; the law already provides for a Government building for the use of the Subtreasury and other governmental activities.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is not going to be built?

Mr. DYER. Yes; they can go ahead now.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman know the Secretary of the Treasury is not going to build it?

Mr. DYER. No; he has held it up to see if Congress would change the legislation in order to save the expense of the vaults.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us let it go over until after the Christmas holidays and then it can be taken up just as well.

Mr. DYER. The Committee on Buildings and Grounds took the matter up. They called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a report and he reported, recommending that this bill be enacted into law, and has recommended even to the last Congress that he was very much in favor of it. The Secretary of the Treasury not only this Congress, but the last Congress, recommended this thing to be done, because he is not in favor of going ahead with the building and putting in expensive vaults that the Subtreasury realizes it does not need.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. RUCKER. What benefit is it to go to the foot of the calendar?

Mr. BLANTON. It gives us a chance to look into it. The gentleman can get it up any unanimous consent day after Christmas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I am forced to object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition to move to suspend the rules——

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman just yet. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

CONTINUATION OF ALLOWANCES TO NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 213, to which there are two or three Senate amendments, and to pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take up House Joint Resolution with Senate amendments?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 213, continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WALSH. I think it ought to be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution with amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 213, continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy.

Whereas since it now appears that peace will not have been declared by October 1, 1919, on which date officers of the Navy, by operation of law, will cease to receive the benefits prescribed in the act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129); Whereas said benefits will accrue to officers of the Army until peace shall have been declared: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in the act of July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 8), which reads as follows:

"The act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), granting under certain conditions to every commissioned officer of the Army the right to quarters in kind for their dependents or the authorized commutation therefor, including the allowances for heat and light, shall hereafter be construed to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war and in no event beyond October 1, 1919," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Also the following Senate amendments were read:

Page 1, line 1, of the preamble, strike out "will" and insert "has."
Page 1, line 1, of the preamble, strike out "have."
Page 1, line 5, of the preamble, strike out the period and insert a comma and the word "and."
Page 2, line 5, after "repealed," insert a colon and "Provided, That officers of the Navy and Marine Corps shall be entitled to all the rights and benefits under said act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), from and after October 1, 1919, and during the present emergency."
The title was amended to include "and Marine Corps."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the first amendment was, I understood, to strike out the word "will" in the first line of the preamble and insert the word "has"?

Mr. BUTLER. That is true.

Mr. WALSH. Then it will read:

Whereas since it now appears that peace has not have been declared.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the gentleman will find it is part of the Senate amendment that the word "have" should be stricken out.

Mr. WALSH. These are Senate amendments, I assume?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And the preamble was not stricken out as it previously passed the House?

Mr. BUTLER. The preamble was amended. The first amendment is to strike out the word "will," in the second line, and insert the word "has," and then strike out the word "have," so that it will read:

Whereas since it now appears that peace has not been declared by October 1.

The second amendment, I will say to the gentleman, is to insert the word "and" after the part of the preamble in parenthesis, namely "Public, No. 129," so as to connect the other "whereas" with it:

And whereas said benefits will accrue to the officers of the Army until peace shall have been declared.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object further, Mr. Speaker, the amendments that have been put onto the resolution itself are to the effect that these allowances shall be continued and be made retroactive back to October 1.

Mr. BUTLER. It has that effect, and I will tell my friend why. When this resolution was introduced and first considered here under suspension of the rules it was anticipated that it would be passed prior to October 1. On the day it was considered under suspension of the rules, my friend will recall, which was on September 23, it was in the evening time, and a question of no quorum was raised. Then the business passed over until the next suspension day, which was the third Monday in September, when there was not a suspension of the rules, because the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations moved to consider an appropriation bill or other measure on that Monday reported from his committee. Therefore, it was found on the Speaker's table on the next suspension day as unfinished business. I asked the Speaker to allow me to move to suspend the rules to include the Senate amendment, which amendment had come over in the meantime from the Senate upon another and similar resolution—No. 112. The Speaker said it had better be voted upon, as it remained upon the table as unfinished business. Consequently, there was a roll call and the measure was passed under the suspension of the rules. Then this same resolution went over to the Senate and the amendment was added.

October 1 had passed. I want to take to myself the blame for this amendment to the last naval bill. In order to reduce the expenses, and in the haste in which we made up the naval appropriation bill last summer, I inserted the provision now considered in the bill, and I then did a rank injustice to the officers of the Navy, and I have been told about it a good many times. My friend knows the pressure that has been made to increase the compensation of officers of the Navy. I am especially anxious that this measure, which was made to help the Army, and construed also to be to the advantage of the Navy in 1918, might be continued during the emergency, and if this amendment is adopted it will be so continued.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has under consideration a bill providing for readjustment of the pay of the Navy, has he not?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. But no report has been made on that bill.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman expects a report from the committee on that measure?

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that my friend will still continue the same confidence in our committee's disposition to be economical that he has always manifested. I will answer the gentleman candidly, as he asks the question. I believe at this time, and I have been working at it industriously for four months, that Congress must be asked to assist some of the noncommissioned and petty officers of the Navy. I discovered this morning that 1,700 enginemen have left the ships because they are not paid proper compensation. It is that part of the bill to which I am directing my attention. If this measure passes it will bring to these officers of the Navy what they expected to have and what they expected they would have and bring them a little compensation which, in my effort to keep the hands of Congress upon the appropriations, I deprived them of.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

Mr. WALSH. I will yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] probably rose first.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am not quite clear as to the gentleman's intention. Is it to move to concur in the Senate amendment?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. It is only to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman clear that the Senate amendment corresponds with the amendment he has noted on his bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I understood the reading, the Clerk did not report it that way. Was there a mistake in the reading?

Mr. BUTLER. I think not. I copied it with the greatest care. The purpose of the amendment is this: If we had succeeded in passing the resolution through the House in September and had gotten it to the Senate exactly as I anticipated, then October 1 would have been yet before us, and the allowance of money would still have gone to these officers. But having got tied up between the House and the Senate, and especially here upon one occasion when we did not have a quorum that would have enabled us to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules, it became necessary to make the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman wants to concur in the Senate amendment he should be certain that the amendment is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for calling my attention to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask that the Clerk report it again.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendments.

The Senate amendments were again read.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Clerk did not report it that way before.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is all right.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought the Clerk in reading it must have overlooked that part of the amendment. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that these were allowances which officers of the Navy had expected to receive.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Did they have any inside information that the treaty would not be ratified by October 1? Why should they expect to receive these allowances later than October 1, when the original provision only lasted until peace was declared?

Mr. BUTLER. I wish I could answer my friend directly. I have not any knowledge on that point. No officer in the service has ever made any statement in my presence in which he attempted to impress me with a view as to when the emergency would be over. I may say to my friend this: That no public official and no officer of the Navy, to the best of my recollection, has ever made any request of me that they should be set right; but I have heard it said that I have been opposed to increasing the salaries of the officers of the Navy when I with my own hand took from them what the act of Congress last year gave them. I will further say to my friend that I would not have done it if I had contemplated that the emergency would have lasted beyond October 1. I would have allowed these men to have had the benefit of the allowance which the comptroller said the act of 1918 gave them.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, they have had this allowance for a longer period than they had any right to expect they would receive it after the armistice was signed. Now, of course, this means practically that they expect to receive this increased allowance forever, so far as the service is concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir. The act of 1918 provides that only during the emergency shall these allowances be paid to the officers of the Army. The comptroller has construed the act as extending these allowances to the officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps. They last only during the emergency.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, practically the emergency has long since ceased, but theoretically we are not at peace.

Mr. BUTLER. It was held yesterday that we are still going on with the war. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Theoretically we are not at peace, but practically we are at peace so far as allowances are concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. I have felt so, my friend, that we were.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I can see no reason why we should pay this allowance now unless we are to make this permanent law.

Mr. BUTLER. I would not ask to do it——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And so far as I am concerned, I am frank to say—the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not very well say—that I think it is very much more important to economize in the expenditures of the Government than it is to increase the pay of anybody at present. The only way we can get back to bedrock and away from high prices is to economize in the Government and in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Let me say to my friend this: Are you willing to trust this committee for an economical appropriation of funds for the Navy? I know the gentleman will. I have talked with the gentleman frequently.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will make no promises in advance. I propose to vote, whenever I get a chance, for economy in the service. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. So do I. I have voted for all the economies that have been suggested.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know the gentleman as well as any other man in the House. He is real economy itself, if he had his way.

Mr. BUTLER. I propose to have it or I will not have any way at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not sure.

Mr. BUTLER. I know my old friend of a quarter of a century thinks I am "easy." I am thinking about the American public that has these taxes to pay, but I will say to the gentleman that I think it is in the interest of economy to pass this measure now. I think it will relieve the tension that is now upon us.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not clear in my mind as to the effect of the passage of the resolution as now presented. The provision to be repealed was one which applied to the Navy, for a certain period——

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me finish my inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MONDELL. The provision which it is proposed to repeal is a provision that applies to the Navy, for a certain time, an act passed for the Army, or intended for the Army, and giving certain additional allowances.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true, is it not?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; that is true. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman let me finish my statement?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I thought I was informed about this matter, but the more I have listened to this discussion the more confused I have become, and I want to know how far wrong I am.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think the gentleman is wrong at all.

Mr. MONDELL. The provision which it is proposed to repeal is a provision which was carried in the naval bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The effect of which was to give certain men in the Navy for a time the benefit of certain additional allowances which had been provided for the Army?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; but if my friend will permit me to make a statement now, I will go back to 1918——

Mr. MONDELL. While the act originally was intended to apply only to the Army, it was considered to apply to the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. And in order to limit it, you placed a limitation, as far as the Navy was concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Naval Affairs did.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if you repeal this provision, your assumption is that the auditor will still apply the same rule as formerly, and so long as these allowances go to the Army they will go to the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. I am assuming that they have construed the original act as applying to the Navy, and therefore if we take out this limitation I assume that the original act will be construed to apply.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think the discussion that has been had clearly demonstrates that the proposed amendments of the Senate are not in the nature of economy. I opposed this resolution when it was here before, and the amendments of the Senate simply carry it back to October 1, 1919, which I contended would be necessary in order for these allowances to be payable; and much as I regret to interpose an objection to anything favored by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I think this is a matter that ought not to be permitted to come up by unanimous consent, and I object.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table H. J. Res. 213 and concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table H. J. Res. 213 and concur in the Senate amendments. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands a second.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman wishes to ask me a question I will reserve my time.

Mr. KNUTSON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. How much does this involve?

Mr. BUTLER. This will involve about $10,000 a day.

Mr. BEGG. For how many days?

Mr. BUTLER. Until the emergency is over. Assuming that during the month of January we shall have an announcement of peace, it will be for October, November, December, and part of January. I have been calculating it by the day and not by the month.

Mr. LAYTON. What does the gentleman mean by emergency—until the league of nations is indorsed?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know, my friend, what is meant by that. [Laughter.] I should like to inform my good neighbor, but I do not know.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. A few moments ago, when the gentleman made the statement that he favored an increase in the pay of the petty officers——

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Coupled with that statement the gentleman said he had just been advised that some 1,700 enginemen of the Navy had gone out.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; they have left their ships.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman tell us what he knows about that? Did they strike, or what?

Mr. BUTLER. No; these men never strike. These men have left, not all at one time, and evidently not by concerted action, but they have left the service of the Government. The war is now over—no; the war is not over. I would be standing upon both sides of the question if I said it was over.

Mr. KNUTSON. Stand right in the middle.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. This is retroactive since October 1?

Mr. BUTLER. No; it is not retroactive. It is simply continuing.

Mr. KNUTSON. Exactly.

Mr. SNYDER. Let us find out about the 1,700 engineman who went out.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman to tell us about that.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be very glad to do it. There are in the Navy from 4,000 to 4,500 enginemen, chief machinists, and their assistants, first, second, and third grade. The chief machinists are most of them yet in the service, as I discover upon an examination of the records this morning, but as to the first, second, and third class machinists many of them have gone out into civil life. They are employed upon merchantmen, employed by the Shipping Board at enormous figures. We pay these men perhaps from $60 to $75 a month, and they get maybe three and a half times that from the Shipping Board.

Mr. SNYDER. I evidently got the wrong impression from what the gentleman said. I took it these men had left the service to-day, in a body.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. SNYDER. Due to the fact that their compensation was not satisfactory.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is right about the compensation part of it, but they did not leave in a body.

Mr. HULINGS. They could not leave until they were discharged.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. This bill applies to all officers of the Navy from October 1, 1919, until the emergency is over.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; it continues the pay which they had prior to October 1.

Mr. GARNER. Then it will apply to officers or men who were in the Navy who have resigned since October 1, as well as to those who are still in the service?

Mr. BUTLER. I understand not.

Mr. GARNER. Why not? I want to get at the facts, now. But the bill provides that the same compensation shall be allowed the Navy that was allowed prior to October 1.

Mr. BUTLER. When any man resigns, then all his pay ends.

Mr. GARNER. If he had this pay coming to him——

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, if he resigned in the middle of October, I would not ask to make an act retroactive; but the purpose was as I have endeavored to explain, that we made the attempt to pass a joint resolution in September when we discovered the emergency would exist October 1. We started of our own motion to set that right, but by reason of the interlocking between the two bodies, creating some confusion, that date passed. Now, without the Senate amendment the pay would be lost to the officers in October, November, and perhaps half of December. I do not think that is right. I have explained, in the presence of my friends, that I hold myself partly responsible. I think that I went possibly too fast; in endeavoring to cut off a dead finger I cut off a good one.

Mr. GARNER. The law will continue as long as the emergency exists.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; the Army is drawing this pay, and it will continue during the emergency, and all we ask is the same for the officers of the Navy, including the warrant officers with commission rank.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I have heard it stated that the reason there is a shortage of enginemen on the eastern coast is that they have all been sent to the Pacific coast to be there when they had the big parade with the President and the Secretary of War present.

Mr. BUTLER. I must not take up much of the time of this session, but I want to say that I do not believe a word of it. I have for 24 years advocated a fleet on the Pacific coast. I think it belongs to us as well as the Atlantic coast, and it was not until the gentleman who now occupies the office became the Secretary of the Navy that I was able to impress my views upon him. He finally consented to take care of the Pacific coast. I am glad he has taken the fleet over there. There will be no trouble from any nation on that side while that fleet is out there. [Applause.] I am glad he has sent it to the Pacific. We can not have the naval stations out there that are asked for at this time, because we have not the money.

Mr. SNELL. But it is said that the mechanics and engineers are all out there at the present time.

Mr. BUTLER. Listen, if you please. The American people need not be disturbed if some of the officers of the Navy and some of the petty officers of the Navy decline to stand by their ships. We propose to have a Navy notwithstanding.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand the statement made on behalf of the original bill is that it was intended to put the officers of the Navy on the same footing as the officers of the Army with regard to drawing certain allowances.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. For the same period. Now, why did they insert the language "but in no event beyond October 1, 1919"?

Mr. BUTLER. That was a hallucination; I thought we would then be in peace. My friend from Tennessee is always kindly disposed toward me, and he will perhaps share a part of the blame. I was insistent that the war would be over and that there would be no more fighting and peace would be declared before October 1, and then we would know what the appropriations were to be and what demands there would be on the Treasury, and we thought that we would cut it off October 1.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Did not the use of that language carry the impression to us in the House that whether or not the war came to an end by that date, that thereafter the allowances would not go to these officers?

Mr. BUTLER. I think the gentleman from Virginia is justified in drawing that conclusion. I am endeavoring to give to him what was in the mind of the committee at the time the provision was put in the bill. If we had thought that this emergency would extend after October 1, I assure the gentleman the provision would not have been reported.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What was the use of the language except to carry that idea to the minds of the Members of the House whether or not the termination of the war came, this allowance would not be carried beyond that time? What was contained in the minds of the committee would be accomplished if they had left out the reference to October 1, 1919.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; if the war had ended all of this compensation would have disappeared.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If you had left out the reference to October 1, 1919, you would have put the officers of the Navy on the same footing as the officers of the Army.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; they would remain on the same footing they were on.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And that would have been continued according to the ruling of the controller——

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. So this language meant nothing whatever, except to carry the idea that after that date the allowance would terminate.

Mr. BUTLER. We had the idea that the war would be over by that time and that this allowance would cease. I could hardly tell why we put it October 1.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Because you wanted to make a good showing on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. We did; and have some idea of what the appropriations were to be.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If the Army bill had carried a provision limiting the pay to October 1, then this bill would not be in here?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. GARNER. It is the result of continued legislation, if the Army gets something the Navy wants it. If you had limited the Army bill to October 1, this bill would not be in here.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, all should cease on October 1.

Mr. GARNER. And they are merely asking it now because the Army is getting something that they are not entitled to.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, not that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Let me answer the gentleman from Texas first. I hope my 15 minutes will be up presently, for I do not think that I am doing any good. [Laughter.] Why, of course, I would say in answer to the gentleman. What one Member of Congress wants another wants. Are we not all human?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that answers the question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the bill ought to pass, because I believe that so long as these allowances go to the Army it is entirely proper that the officers of the Navy should have the same benefits. I am very glad, however, that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has taken the position that there are to be none of these great increases of pay and allowances that people are asking for and that Members of Congress are being importuned to grant. However we may feel about these matters, whatever our sympathy may be, no matter how much we would like to add to the pay and emoluments of men in the public service, the condition of the Treasury is such now that these requests and demands can not be met and allowed.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me in order that I may ask a question of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Then if the same effort is made to limit the Army to these allowances as it was proposed to limit the Navy, there will be no demand for this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, this is not a very large matter.

Mr. GARNER. Only $10,000 a day, that is all.

Mr. MONDELL. The law makes provision for the Army and we are not going to repeal it. In the providence of God and the good sense of the Senate we hope that before very long the emergency will have ceased, and then all of these allowances will cease, but so long as the Army receives these allowances, I think the Navy should also.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us which one of those sources he has the greatest confidence in? [Laughter.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. In the arguments that have been made for the passage of this resolution nothing has been said as to the necessity for it, except to put the naval officer upon a par with the Army officer in the matter of compensation for commutation of quarters.

Mr. BUTLER. He expected that and he has arranged all his affairs accordingly.

Mr. SNYDER. That is all very true, but in reality——

Mr. BUTLER. The effect is just what the gentleman states.

Mr. SNYDER. In reality that is what the gentleman is striving to do.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Not because of any necessity on the part of the naval officer for an increase in compensation. Let us have it just as it is. When gentlemen say that they are opposed to increases in the future, why not start by doing the thing that we ought to do and eliminate now? Starting to eliminate means nothing. The thing that counts is to eliminate, and this proposition here is not based at all upon the necessity of the naval officer, but is based wholly upon a question of putting him on a par with the Army so far as compensation is concerned.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 15 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to yield to my friend from Massachusetts. He knows that, but I have only 5 minutes left, and I must yield some of that to my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have promised the gentleman from Tennessee 5 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the gentleman want some of my time?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no; go ahead.

Mr. BUTLER. I will give the gentleman three minutes, and I will reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this is a very plain and a very simple matter. Congress passed an act providing commutation of quarters for the Army. Under a prior law the commutations of the Navy are the same as provided by law from time to time for the Army, so that when Congress passed a special act providing commutations of quarters for officers of the Army, to continue during the emergency, by operation of the prior law they became available to the Navy.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I do not think he has made one point quite clear. The officers of the Army are entitled to commutation of quarters when they are not with troops, but when they are with troops they are not so entitled. When the officers went away to this war they left their families here, and they did not have the commutation of quarters. A law was passed to give them commutation of quarters.

Mr. PADGETT. That is correct. In the naval appropriation bill which was passed last April, in a spirit of economy and assuming that the war would be over, that the emergency would cease, by the 1st of October, 1919, a provision was inserted providing that the commutation of quarters under the prior law which I mentioned a moment ago should not be construed to apply to the Navy beyond October 1, 1919.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. There is but one mistake that the committee made in the interest of economy, and that was in not including the word "army" also in that provision.

Mr. PADGETT. Well, I think the gentleman is entirely wrong when he gets to the facts. Now, that provision was inserted in the naval appropriation bill. The effect of that is that the emergency continuing the Army is now receiving a benefit of that special act, but the Navy is precluded from receiving it after October 1 by virtue of this clause inserted in the Navy appropriation bill providing that it should not be considered to apply to the Navy after October 1. Now, this resolution that was passed by the House was reported by the committee back in September, and we supposed that we would get it enacted before October. The only effect of it is to repeal this provision in the naval appropriation bill providing that commutation of quarters shall not be considered to apply to naval officers after October 1.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What then was the purpose of putting in the naval appropriation act the language "and in no event beyond October 1, 1919"?

Mr. PADGETT. That was to stop it at that time, because the committee supposed that the emergency would be over at that time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But they had already stated in the same paragraph that it should be continued only during the period of the war?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, that was sufficient——

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As far as the war was concerned; and then you added "but in no event beyond October 1." What is the purpose of putting that in?

Mr. PADGETT. As I have stated, it was to stop it on the 1st day of October.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Regardless of whether peace was declared or not? In other words, they went forward then and are now backing up?

Mr. PADGETT. That fixed a definite time. That was to stop it on the 1st day of October.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whether the war was over or not?

Mr. SNYDER. Which was absolutely right.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, the House passed a resolution repealing that clause of the naval appropriation bill providing that it shall not be construed to apply to the Navy after October 1. As I say, we thought we would get that enacted before October 1, but delays have occurred. The bill went over to the Senate, and the Senate passed another bill just identical with this bill and sent it over here, so that the House bill had gone over there and the bill came over here. Then the Senate, in order to get action upon the same bill, passed the House bill with an amendment making it operative upon the 1st day of October, so that these officers will not lose their commutation during the months of October, November, and December. In other words, so that the act will continue. A record vote was taken upon it, and there were but something like——

Mr. BUTLER. Six.

Mr. PADGETT. Five or six votes against it. Two hundred and fifty odd voted in favor of the passage of the resolution.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. In just a moment. The statement was made a moment ago that we were asking for it simply because the Army has it and because there is no need of it. I want to disabuse your minds of that. There is a tremendous need of it. We have had extensive hearings, and if you will take the pains to read those hearings any fair-minded man, I think, will come to the conclusion that there is an imperative demand that the pay of officers should be increased, and this is simply to give them the benefit of these commutations from October 1 during the continuance of the emergency, the same as is being received by the Army.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The war service of the Army proper ceases as they reach our shores. Now, is there anything in this proposition? Has the Navy continued to render war services during this period in going back and forth for war purposes?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; they have been bringing men back and taking supplies over and things of that kind.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As a matter of fact, has not a larger part of the Navy been engaged in war work right up to the present time and during this period for which the gentleman asks this allowance?

Mr. PADGETT. A great deal of it, yes, sir; and I want to say the only effect now of this amendment of the Senate is that instead of its becoming operative and continuing for the time it becomes a law now that there shall be no hiatus, that it shall take effect from the 1st day of October, and from the time that the Army has been receiving it, and when it was expected that it would become legislation. I yield back what time I may have remaining.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Virginia consume the balance of his time? How much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has 15 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania 2 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish some time?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir, unless somebody desires to ask me a question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is stated on behalf of this legislation both by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] that it originated in a spirit of economy, but I fail to see how they make good that contention. At the very moment the economy feature of this statute becomes effective, they propose to repeal it. No economy will be or could be secured under this statute, unless the allowances referred to are discontinued as of the date fixed in the resolution, and the discontinuance is perpetuated. But, confronted with the unexpected situation that the original provision of the naval bill is really protecting the Treasury and effecting a not inconsiderable economy, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs insists that really his committee is taken by surprise, that it was not intended to secure a real economy by the language used, and if it is now operating to that effect, it should be repealed by the pending resolution.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman is an older Member of the House and I know nothing about it. How long does commutation attach to an Army officer?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I should prefer the gentleman should ask that question of some Member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LAYTON. What I mean is the permanent allowance made to an Army officer?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It attaches under certain prescribed conditions, and so long as the conditions exist, the allowances continue.

Mr. LAYTON. During the emergency?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will explain to the gentleman from Delaware that there is a continuing permanent law that gives to the Army officer who is not with troops commutation of quarters. During the emergency we passed a law giving to the officer who was with troops a commutation of quarters, so that his family could be cared for while he was in France fighting for us. The law of the Navy was, in general terms, that they should have the same commutation of quarters the Army has, and so by operation of law when we gave the Army the commutation of quarters for men who were with troops we gave it to the naval officers who were with troops and who theretofore did not have it. The emergency legislation limited it until peace was declared, but peace has not been declared. As explained here, they attempted to repeal the law for the Navy for the purpose of making political capital for the Republicans, who were claiming a desire for economy, and now that they find they can not do it without inequality they are in favor of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman give me a minute now?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] that the experts of the Navy Department reported to me to-day that they have thirty to forty millions of dollars left over out of this bill, and if we had two weeks more we would save that money, but we do not have it. We were trying to economize. And I will say to my friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] that this does seem a clear and honest and methodical way. Our purpose was to keep our hands on the appropriations and know about what charges would be put upon the Treasury and limit them everywhere we could. Even then, perhaps $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 will be left over at the end of the year.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. May I have one more minute?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not just now but later.

I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] that the proper action for this House to take is to continue the good work that you say you set out to do; in other words, we should defeat this resolution. That action on our part will make effective the scheme of economy which you had in mind when you submitted the naval bill to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Usually the gentleman has no trouble to get me on his side, but he could not get me over there on this.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman understand that the only justification for the passage of this resolution is that since the committee has had this lapse in the idea of economy they now feel that they ought to put the naval officers, at least, upon a par with the Army officers, until such time as somebody declares the war to be over?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Committee on Naval Affairs is now confronted with a most unexpected situation. They find to their consternation that their legislation is proving effective for economy. Hence they clamorously insist that it should be repealed.

Mr. SNYDER. When they put in the bill that this commutation should go along further than October 1, that is what they meant?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I suppose that the language to the effect that under no circumstances should the allowances be paid after October 1, 1919, was intended as a legislative joker.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to go on record as saying if the committee starts out to practice economy they ought to continue to do it, whether it meets up with some proposed advance that offsets it or not. I take the position also, with the gentleman from Illinois, that I am opposed to any more expenditure of money except for regular and economical purposes.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] a question. Suppose we pass this resolution and it becomes a law to-day, and that by the first of the year such action should be taken as will permit the President to proclaim that peace has come. What effect would this resolution have then, so far as increase in pay or allowance for the year is concerned?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This resolution is both retroactive and prospective. There is only a trifle of a million dollars involved in this joint resolution,—chicken feed, I believe is the phrase applied in these days to an expenditure of only a million dollars.

Mr. GOOD. From the statement of the gentleman from New York, I was rather led to believe that this law only applied during the emergency; but, from what the gentleman says, it is a permanent law.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no. I would not vote for it if it was. It is only an emergency measure.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me two minutes?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I think I will proceed with my much-interrupted speech, and yield later.

Mr. GOOD. It is not going to do any good if it is for only during the emergency. It is only going to give some officers about $10,000 a day for services they perform, if the President should proclaim peace to-morrow. It will not help you to keep officers in the service next year.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The only merit of this resolution is that it will help some naval officers in the matter of pay during the emergency, or technical continuance of the war.

Mr. GOOD. Is it not true that if you put this in effect in the Navy, after the President has proclaimed peace, it will not help them at all?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not going to have the gentleman now get up of his own will and say it will loot the Treasury. It does not.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. How much of my time has now been consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I started out to say, the only way to maintain our consistency in this matter and uphold the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his spirit of economy, is to vote down the resolution. That will make the original action of the Naval Committee an effective instrument of economy.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield a minute?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Do you not think, to make it a perfectly complete thing, that we better go back and cut out this commutation for the Army?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have no objection to the gentleman's offering an amendment to that effect if he can do so. The merits of this increase of naval pay have not been discussed at all. No one has undertaken to show in any sufficient fashion that on the merits these officers are entitled to this extra compensation.

The simple statement has been made that because the Army was getting something, therefore the Navy wanted it, and was entitled to it. As I understand the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, there is far more reason why the Army officers should have received these allowances, than the officials of like rank in the Navy.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said in this connection, I think, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], that the naval officers were expecting these allowances; that they had made their arrangements with reference to the same, and that therefore it would be a hardship on them not to pass this resolution. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that, far from this being so, that these naval officers were specifically warned, and advised, by the terms of the naval bill that after October 1, 1919, these allowances would not be paid. Therefore they could not have been making their arrangements, unless they had such confidence——

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; but you ought not to interrupt me in the middle of a sentence. I will yield.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. I just wanted to call your attention to the fact that the Navy is still active, and has been active during all these months, and the activity of the minesweepers, who have just raised the mines, has been remarkable. They have just done the most dangerous work of the war and have just returned to this country. This is only for commutation of quarters and not for extra pay. This date of October 1 was probably put in the bill inadvertently, because they thought the war would then be over.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, no; I am not willing to allow the Committee on Naval Affairs to be thus misrepresented. It was put in designedly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Either way, it is only a matter of justice to the officers of the Navy.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am trying to be just to the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and to help them maintain their purpose in respect to economy. I think the House should support them in that attitude. We hear so little at this time of real economy, and have so few opportunities to vote for a proposition of reduction, that I think that the committee should be supported in its original attitude. To pass this joint resolution certainly would not be in the interests of economy.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not now.

Mr. TILSON. I thought the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No. What evidence had I given that I had yielded the floor? [Laughter.] I was doing my best to complete at least one sentence without interruption.

Mr. Speaker, summing up the argument, I think we should disregard the pathetic appeal of the Committee on Naval Affairs in this matter, as presented both by the chairman of that committee [Mr. BUTLER] and the ranking member on the Democratic side [Mr. PADGETT]: First, because they started out in this matter in a spirit of economy. This is a day and an hour calling for economy, and we should seek to make the spirit of economy effective: Second, this is now a retroactive resolution and as a rule this body does not and ought not to favor a retroactive proposition: Third, these naval officers have not been taken unawares, for the simple reason that the original provision specifically advised them of the fact that after October 1, 1919, they would under no circumstances receive these allowances. Therefore as patriotic citizens they presumably made their arrangements and ordered their domestic affairs to conform to the law. For all of these reasons I think this resolution ought to be voted down by the House.

Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to ask me a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; I wanted some time.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I regret that I have only one minute left, and that has been promised to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, one point that has not been brought out with respect to this resolution is a point favorable to the passage of it. As the law now stands, without passing this bill, we are really penalizing the naval officer who goes to sea. The reason why the law was originally enacted for the Army was the fact that under the law as it then existed the Army officer who was not with troops drew commutation of quarters, while the officer who was serving in the field with troops and doing the fighting, when there was fighting to be done, drew no commutation of quarters. As a result the family of the officer in the War Department or engaged at some other desk job was provided for, while the family of the officer in the field with his regiment had nowhere to live. It was the same way with the Navy. The officers who were on the ships at sea and doing the hardest kind of work had no commutation until the law was enacted which it is now desired to amend. Unless the limitation to October 1, 1919, is repealed we shall again have the anomalous condition of providing that officers who are safely ensconced in Washington or Annapolis or somewhere else shall draw commutation of quarters while the officers who go to sea do not have it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] for a minute. I believe he has two minutes left.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. I will yield to the gentleman a minute.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the House is forgetting the real question, the real bone of all this proposition. This is not a question of economy. It is a question whether you are going to pay patriotic, efficient men in the Navy a decent wage to live on. [Applause.]

These men are leaving the Navy because they can not afford to stay. They love their profession, but they also love their families, and the pay that they get does not enable them to stay in the service.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. No. I have only a minute, and three-quarters of that is probably gone.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to know if it is the sailors that are quitting, or the officers?

Mr. HULINGS. It is the officers and the sailors both. I happen to know something about it. This little honorarium, as you might call it, this little addition to their pay, is the thing for us to do. I am in favor of this resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has one minute.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut stated the position squarely. These officers receive no commutation of quarters while at sea. They got it during the war by reason of the act of 1918. I repeat it again—and I could do no better if I had a month for the purpose—that this is simply a square act of justice. We must keep this naval force afloat, and this will help us to do it. I appeal to the House to pass this resolution. It sets no precedent. Take it from me, if you please, this is along the line of economy looking to the future, and it will be helpful to us all around. I ask you to pass it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] moves that the House suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 17.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the Senate amendment is concurred in.

SUGAR.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes, with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules and pass S. 3284 with amendments, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read first.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It has to be read first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to continue during the year ending December 31, 1920, the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, and to vote or use the stock in such corporation held by him for the benefit of the United States, or otherwise exercise his control over the corporation and its directors in such a manner as to authorize and require them to adopt and carry out until December 31, 1920, plans and methods of securing, if found necessary for the public good, an adequate supply and an equitable distribution of sugar at a fair and reasonable price to the people of the United States. Sections 5 and 10 of the act entitled "An act to further provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, as far as the same relates to raw or refined sugar, sirups, or molasses, are hereby continued in full force and effect until December 31, 1920, notwithstanding the provisions of section 24 of said act: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall expire as to the domestic product September 30, 1920: And provided further, That the zone system of sale and distribution of sugars heretofore established by the said United States Sugar Equalization Board shall be abolished and shall not be reestablished or maintained, and that sugars shall be permitted to be sold and to circulate freely in every portion of the United States. The termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said termination pursuant to this act; but all rights and liabilities under this act arising before its termination shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if the act had not terminated. Any offense committed and all penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to such termination may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been terminated.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] has 20 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill provides that the President is authorized to continue during the year ending December 31, 1920, the United States Sugar Equalization Board, and that sections 5 and 10 of the food-control act, so far as the same relate to sugar, are hereby continued in full force and effect until December 31, 1920.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Are there any committee amendments?

Mr. HAUGEN. There is one committee amendment—to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the matter read from the clerk's desk.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman be good enough to state how the bill reported from his committee differs from the bill that passed the Senate?

Mr. HAUGEN. It differs in this respect: That the Senate bill repeals section 5, the licensing provision of the food-control act, while the amendment continues it with respect to sugar, notwithstanding the termination of the war.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. I am not familiar with this situation, but this was a war measure, as I understand it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; the food-control act was.

Mr. BEE. If peace is declared and the country returns to a peace basis, as if no war had ever existed, what authority has Congress, then, to continue in time of peace a measure for the regulation of certain commodities?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is referring to the act as a whole. I am not sure that section 5 is based entirely upon the war power. The contention is that Congress has the power to pass a law licensing dealers to a certain extent outside of the war power. Besides, this condition results because of the war to a certain extent.

Mr. BEE. If the gentleman will permit the question, before the war was there any law that regulated the sale and use of sugar, such as is now contemplated in this bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; there was not.

Mr. BEE. Then by what authority, when this country is at peace, has the Congress a right to interfere in these matters, unless you go into the domain of licensing and controlling every industry in this country and taking all of them over?

Mr. HAUGEN. The fact that Congress did not assert its authority before the war is no reason why it should not do so at the end of the war. Besides, this condition exists because of the war.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I heard the bill read, the Senate amendment undertakes to repeal the action of the equalization board in establishing zones?

Mr. HAUGEN. It does, and the committee amendment does also.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I understand, the establishment of those zones has resulted in requiring people in certain sections of the country to pay almost double what people pay in other sections of the country?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; through their establishment and the action of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that this amendment which the gentleman seeks to have adopted will do away with that discrimination, and will allow people in different parts of the country to get sugar at substantially the same price?

Mr. HAUGEN. The House amendment also does away with the zone system. It directs its discontinuance.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And will enable people to get sugar at reasonably fair prices?

Mr. HAUGEN. If action is taken in the matter.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. As I understand, the purpose of the extension of this law is to enable the Sugar Equalization Board to act in securing a distribution of sugar at a fair and reasonable price?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman explain what is to be the relation between the authority of this board, which is to secure a uniform price, and the activities of the Attorney General, who has fixed a price of 17 cents for sugar produced in Louisiana and a price of 11 cents for sugar produced in Michigan? Is the authority of the Attorney General to be superseded?

Mr. HAUGEN. The food-control act gives the President of the United States certain authority which he has turned over to the Department of Justice; but there is also in existence this organization, the United States Sugar Equalization Board, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware. Both are agencies of the President.

Mr. CRAMTON. And are we to understand that with the extension of this law the Sugar Equalization Board will proceed with the equalization of the price of sugar, while the Attorney General, also acting under the authority of the President, will proceed to approve a price of 17 cents for Louisiana sugar and a price of 11 cents for Michigan sugar?

Mr. HAUGEN. The whole matter rests with the President of the United States; but as the gentleman has stated, the price of sugar in Louisiana to-day, I understand, is from 17 to 18 cents, while the price in the beet-sugar section is about 10 cents—about 7 or 8 cents difference in price between the two parts of the country. The price in one section is about double the price in another section of the country.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman explained the matter fully when he said it all rested in the hands of the President.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; it rests in the hands of the President.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Surely.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would state in a few words what the actual effect on the country will be of the extension of this law?

Mr. HAUGEN. It will be left up to the President. The President has had the authority, but he has not exercised it. We do not propose to add anything to the authority which he had, nor do we take anything from it. It is suggested here to continue sections 5 and 10 of the food-control act with respect to sugar. Section 5 is the licensing provision and section 10 is the requisition provision.

Mr. SNELL. If the President does not exercise the powers which he already has we will get no relief?

Mr. HAUGEN. We will be exactly where we are now and some will go without sugar as at the present time. There is no question about it—had the President exercised his power under the law the situation now would have been entirely different.

Mr. SNELL. Why do you expect relief by continuing the power?

Mr. HAUGEN. The President has the power to relieve the situation; if he does not do so the responsibility will rest upon him and not upon Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; surely.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it true that England has come into our sugar market and has purchased sugar at a price fixed by the producer, and in some instances running as high as 20 cents a pound?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Wilkinson, a jobber of Washington, before the Senate committee said that he had been offered 22 cents a pound for sugar.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. By England?

Mr. HAUGEN. It has been alleged that sugar is being exported to England and other countries.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that there are millions of tons of sugar on the wharves in New Orleans waiting for shipment to England—sugar that was purchased for 20 or 25 cents a pound for England. I want to know if that is true.

Mr. HAUGEN. We had no evidence before our committee bearing upon that. This is the situation: The world's shortage of sugar is about 2,000,000 tons. There is produced in the United States 1,777,000 long tons. The prewar consumption was about 83 pounds per individual, during the war about 75 pounds, and is at present about 92 pounds. If that is correct, about 4,520,000 long tons of sugar will be required to supply the demand in the United States. The Cuban crop is about four and a half million tons, while their local consumption is but 150,000 tons, leaving, then, 4,350,000 tons for export. From one-quarter to one-third of the Cuban crop has already been exported at the present time. Deducting that from the 4,350,000 tons, they have about 3,000,000 tons for export. If apportioned as it was in the year past, one-third to Europe and two-thirds to the United States, there is about 2,000,000 tons available in Cuba for export to the United States. Add to that the 1,777,000 tons produced in this country and we will have 3,777,000 tons, which is 742,300 tons less than is required.

It goes without saying that it is necessary for Congress to do something to relieve the situation. Although the hour is late and the administration has slept upon its right to avail itself of the opportunity, there is some possibility of saving the situation to some extent. As I have said, we add nothing to the power granted in the food-control act as it relates to sugar, and we take nothing away, but if we pass this bill there will be no excuse for not exercising the power and protecting the people of the United States and supplying them with, if not an adequate supply of sugar, at least partial relief.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does your bill carry any provision for an embargo on sugar?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. We have that under another act.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the House amendment continuing the equalization board takes away the zones.

Mr. HAUGEN. It does. In that respect it is identical with the Senate bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In view of the statement made by the chairman of the committee that the total amount of sugar in sight is only about 2,000,000 tons, the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that there are millions of tons on the wharves at New Orleans is a little inaccurate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If I said tons, I meant pounds.

Mr. MARTIN. If the gentleman from Iowa will yield, I want to say that there are not 5,000,000 pounds of sugar on the wharves at New Orleans. Some few months ago the British Royal Commission got the refiners to refine sugar for them, and it has since been shipped. There is no sugar there that has not been distributed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish the gentleman would explain the discrepancy in the price of sugar in Louisiana and in Michigan.

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand the price in Louisiana is 17 to 18 cents, and in Michigan about 10 cents per pound. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. I will avail myself of the privilege to extend my remarks by inserting extracts from the report and hearings.

The following is quoted from the Senate report on the bill:

Agreeable to the provisions of the Food Administration act, the President by proclamation in the summer of 1918 created the Sugar Equalization Board. Presumably for the purpose of effecting freedom from personal liability, the members of the board on July 15, 1918, filed articles of incorporation in the State of Delaware and obtained a charter under the name of United States Sugar Equalization Board, with authorized capital stock of $5,000,000.

The powers conferred upon the corporation are to purchase, or otherwise acquire, manufacture, sell, dispose of, store, handle, and deal in raw and refined cane and beet sugar, sirups, and molasses.

The capital stock of this corporation was furnished by the President out of his emergency funds, and he holds all the shares of the capital stock of the corporation.

In the fall of 1918 the Sugar Equalization Board procured the 1919 Cuban sugar crop in order to assure to the American consumer a regular supply of sugar at a reasonable price and arranged with the beet-sugar producers of the United States and Louisiana cane-sugar producers to take their product at a compensatory price.

Of the supply of sugar purchased in Cuba, two-thirds was retained for our local requirements, and one-third went to the British Royal Commission for Great Britain, France, and Italy.

The price paid for the Cuban raw sugar was $5.50 a hundred pounds at the northern ports and $5.40 at the southern ports of Cuba. Agreement was had with the sugar refiners whereby sugar was refined at the cost of $1.54 per hundred pounds, which allowed the sale of sugar on the part of the refiners at 9 cents a pound, less 38 cents per hundred pounds retained by the Sugar Equalization Board in order to permit the equalization of prices and to cover cost to administration. The result of the functioning of this board brought about stable prices to the consumer of 10 cents per pound and a fairly equitable distribution of sugar throughout the United States until about July 1, 1919, when a shortage was observed in various parts of the United States, with a tendency on the part of some to exact from the consumer an unreasonable price.

On July 29 of the present year Cuban sugar producers, through their accredited agents, made a written offer to the Sugar Equalization Board to sell the Cuban crop of sugar for 1920 "at a price moderate but compensating to the producer and well within the economic reach of the consumer."

Following the receipt of this offer the Sugar Equalization Board gave thorough consideration to the proposal of the Cuban growers, and on August 14, 1919, addressed the President by letter and memorandum recommending that negotiations be entered into for the purpose of procuring the sugar crop of 1920. The act of the board, however, was not unanimous, as Dr. F. W. Taussig submitted to the President a memorandum suggesting that no negotiations should be entered into with the Cuban producers and that the regulation and restriction of sugar prices should cease with the close of the present arrangement December 31.

Aside from acknowledging the arrival of these memoranda, no action was taken by the President, so that the Sugar Equalization Board on the 20th of September addressed another communication to the Chief Executive stating that "the time is fast approaching, if it has not arrived, when we will be unable to control the Cuban crop of sugar for the year 1919–20 unless action is taken at once."

This communication also contains the statement that a considerable tonnage of Cuban sugar had already been sold and that the board felt that unless prompt action was taken the representatives of the Cuban producers would withdraw their proposition. On September 22 the Executive Secretary acknowledged the receipt of this note. On the same day the representatives of the Cuban cane sugar producers wrote to the chairman of the Sugar Equalization Board directing his attention to their offer of July 29 to sell the Cuban crop of 1920 and observed:

"In the interval that has transpired we have awaited your answer, confidently believing that the United States Government would undertake the continued control of sugar, and every interest concerned, especially the American consumer, would experience the advantage of a stabilized market. Unfortunately the logic of the situation has not impressed the Government, or in keeping with its traditional policy—the war being over—it is thought best to permit the market to be ruled by the natural law of supply and demand. While we had hoped for a different conclusion as to the negotiations put forward by Cuba, * * * we reluctantly accept the situation now existing and return the authority under which we are acting."

On the day following the president of the Sugar Equalization Board transmitted this letter to the President. No action having been taken by the President concerning these negotiations, the situation was called to the attention of the Senate by the junior Senator of Indiana, Mr. NEW, through a resolution dated October 1, 1919. A subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry commenced hearings on this resolution on October 3 and thereafter a bill was introduced into the Senate authorizing the President to acquire raw sugars, if the same could be had at a reasonable price, and to prohibit exportation of sugar and to license the importation, manufacture, storage, sale, and distribution of sugar during the year ending December 31, 1920.

The following is quoted from the House report on the bill:

Section 5, food-control act, of August 10, 1917, gives the President authority to license the import, manufacture, storage, or distribution of foods, including sugar. Section 10 authorized him to requisition foods, hence the administration, under the food-control and other acts, had, and still has, the authority and funds to buy and sell sugar, to license the dealers therein, and thus regulate the price and provide an adequate supply. It is unnecessary to set out that had favorable action been taken upon the recommendation of the Sugar Equalization Board of August 14, 1919, to the President; or its urgent appeal of September 20, calling attention to the fact that the time was fast approaching, if it had not already arrived, when we would be unable to control the Cuban crop of 1920, and that unless prompt action was taken the representative of the Cuban producers would withdraw their proposition, which was done; or had action been taken on these negotiations when the Cuban producers' letter was transmitted to the President the unfortunate circumstances with which we are now confronted would have been averted. Though that opportunity has passed, even now, if advantage is taken of the law, it is believed that the situation can be relieved to a large extent.

In view of the failure to take advantage of the opportunity, the inconvenience incurred to the public by the shortage of sugar and the hardship certain to follow, the continuation of the Sugar Equalization Board and the extension of sections 5 and 10 of the food-control act, in so far as they relate to sugar, seems essential. Your committee has seen fit to amend the bill by extending sections 5 and 10 of the food-control act, in so far as they relate to sugar, notwithstanding the provisions of section 24 of said act, which reads in part.

In support of the committee amendment, the following are quoted (a telegram from the chairman of the United States Sugar Equalization Board):

"Hon. G. N. HAUGEN,

"Chairman House Committee on Agriculture, Washington, D. C.:

"Replying your wire 13th, the United States Sugar Equalization Board is unanimously of the opinion that without the powers of licensing, embargo, and distribution control, its continuation could not serve any useful purpose, and these powers the McNary bill fails to provide. Furthermore, the time has gone by when a considerable portion of the 1920 Cuban crop can be purchased at a reasonable price. The Equalization Board was a war measure, dealing only with last year's crop, and this has all been distributed. It has no control over domestic sugars now available in fair volume nor new Cuban sugars, which are now beginning to move.

"(Signed) GEO. A. ZABRISKIE."

Extracts from the statement of Mr. William A. Glasgow, general counsel Sugar Equalization Board, New York, made before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, during the hearings on the sugar shortage:

"You have asked me to prepare a bill setting forth certain powers, as we thought it necessary for that board to have if Congress thought it was proper to purchase the Cuban crop of sugar next year. I prepared that bill and forwarded it to you, as, in our judgment, what was necessary in case you should determine it was desirable to purchase that crop. We are not pressing that bill before Congress or before this committee.

"I do say, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of that board, that the powers in that bill are absolutely necessary to have, in our judgment, if you should decide to purchase the Cuban crop."

"Mr. GLASGOW. I can see nothing, Mr. Chairman, nor can the board see anything that can be accomplished by it in the purchase of the Cuban crop, if the sole function of the sugar board is to go there and buy it and feed it out to the refiners and they feed it out in return to the middlemen, and they feed it out in turn to the dealers for speculation in the United States. Why not? In our judgment it is better to let the speculation begin with the refiners, purchasing from Cuba, and there is no occasion whatever for the sugar board to intervene and purchase the sugar crop in Cuba and give it to the refiners and feed it to them in the proportions which may be agreed upon for them to take and speculate on—some of them perhaps might—or the men they sell to to speculate upon and the American consumer pay the bill of the speculation. If Congress thinks it is all right to let the thing go along, it is entirely satisfactory to us. But our position is that there is no useful function for the Sugar Equalization Board to accomplish unless it is for us to try to fix upon a fair and reasonable price for the purchase of the raw, and a fair and reasonable price for the refining, and a fair and reasonable price of margin to the dealer and get the sugar to the consumer at a reasonable price, outside of speculation, and a uniform price throughout the United States.

"Do I make it clear now, Mr. Chairman, as far as the license feature is concerned?"

"Mr. GLASGOW. I understand. Our position is certainly clear, and I want it to be made clear if I can, that if you gentlemen determine that we ought to buy this crop, give us the powers that are absolutely essential to carry it out; if you determine it is undesirable to buy this crop, then do not make the purchase and let the refiners buy if they can in the markets upon terms.

"Senator MCNARY. Upon that point—and I think it very vital—if Congress simply authorized the Sugar Equalization Board, and gave it the power to acquire the balance of the Cuban crop, you would not desire to function unless you had the power of license and the power of placing embargoes?

"Mr. GLASGOW. Absolutely. We have to control the refiners in the United States in order to accomplish any good by the purchase of that crop.

"Senator MCNARY. You have operated the last two years under a license system, have you not?

"Mr. GLASGOW. Oh, yes. We can not keep the refiners together unless we have the control.

"Senator MCNARY. Has anybody complained of hardness of your control?

"Mr. GLASGOW. No, sir."

Page 164:

"Mr. GLASGOW. We have tried it under the fair price list, which has not been satisfactory at all. Let me ask one other question; Would not your suggestion carry with it the necessity of having money enough to buy all of this sugar?

* * * * * * *

"Let me say one other word, I do not want the license system; I am just as opposed to it as you are on every basis, but from practical experience in this matter I do not see anything but failure ahead of this equalization board without the powers; and we ask simply that unless we are given the powers, that Congress do not put the burden on this board to try to do it."

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] 10 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is not only unnecessary, but its agitation before Congress for the past three months will be responsible for the high price of sugar that will prevail next year.

I say it is unnecessary because it does not give the President or the United States Sugar Equalization Board any more powers than they had in July of this year or than they have now.

The United States Sugar Equalization Board originated with the Food Administration and it was incorporated, with the President as the sole and only stockholder, for the purpose of buying the Cuban crop and controlling the sugar market during the year.

All of the powers of the board are derived from the Lever Act, and this act is still in full force and effect to-day. In July of the present year the Cuban sugar producers wrote the equalization board that they were again prepared to sell this Government their entire Cuban crop if this Government desired to purchase it.

The board held a meeting and on August 14 addressed a letter to the President inclosing the Cuban offer and recommending that the Cuban crop be purchased. Mr. Taussig, a member of the equalization board, dissented from the views of a majority of the board, in a separate memorandum, recommending that governmental control should be relinquished, and stating that if the price of sugar was to be specifically controlled, so should that of bread, meat, and clothing.

The Secretary to the President acknowledged receipt of these communications, stating that they would be brought to the attention of the President.

On September 20 the equalization board again wrote to the President directing his attention to their first communication and stating that unless action was taken at once they would be unable to purchase the Cuban crop.

Receipt of this letter was also acknowledged by the Secretary to the President, but no action was taken by the President himself. On September 22 the Cuban producers withdrew their offer to sell, and on the following day the board wrote the President, stating that the situation was out of hand and that he had, therefore, advised the American sugar refineries as to conditions so that they might purchase raw sugars as per prewar times.

I think it follows from this statement of facts either that the matter was not laid before the President or that if it was he took the advice of Prof. Taussig.

Some definite action with respect to the Cuban crop should have been taken at that time, because the Cubans were then willing to sell their sugars at from 6¼ to 7 cents per pound, and not only could the equalization board have purchased the crop at those figures, but the refiners could have purchased it at the same figures had they known what the policy of the Government would be.

The refiners would have entered the Cuban market after they had been notified by the equalization board on September 20 that they were at liberty to do so, if the agitation in Congress had not immediately followed.

On October 3 the agricultural committee of the Senate began its hearings on the New resolution, which was introduced on September 27 and which resulted in the McNary bill. If this bill had not been introduced, the sugar refiners of this country could and would have purchased the Cuban crop at the same figure as could the equalization board, but with this bill pending, the refiners kept out of the market, waiting to see what the policy of this Government would be. While the refiners kept out of the market, foreign Governments did not, and as a consequence the price of Cuban sugar has been going up, until now it is doubtful whether the Cuban crop can be purchased at 10 cents per pound.

But, Mr. Speaker, the fact that this Government may have adopted a vacillating policy with reference to the Cuban crop is no good reason why a penalty should be visited on the domestic producers of sugar. It is no reason why they should be selected as the one industry in this country that should be controlled and placed under license. It is no reason why it should be selected as the one and only farm product that during the coming year will not have a free and open market.

The sugar producers of this country have never objected to the purchase of the Cuban crop, but on the contrary they have urged it, and yet because this Government failed to purchase the Cuban crop or to give the refiners of this country a free hand to purchase it you now say under the provisions of this bill that you propose to handicap, embarrass, and discourage the domestic producers. I do not believe that this Congress appreciates what this license feature means.

It means that a pound of sugar can not be produced in this country until the producer has first obtained a license from the equalization board. It means that after he has made it it must lie up in some warehouse until he has been told by the board to whom he can sell it or ship it. It means that the man who makes sirup and molasses on his farm, whether from cane or sorghum, must likewise secure a license before he makes it or ships and disposes of it. It means that after it leaves the hands of the producers and goes into the hands of the wholesaler that he too must secure a license and that he must dispose of it according to instructions from the equalization board.

Mr. Speaker, the licensing feature in this bill is entirely unnecessary. If it is not too late, the Cuban crop should be purchased, refined in this country, and distributed to the consumers at the lowest possible figure. This can be done without in any way interfering, tampering with, or discouraging the domestic industry.

The price of Cuban sugars has always controlled the market in this country, and the purchase of the Cuban crop either by the Government or by the refineries will fix the price of sugar in the United States and at the same time guarantee an adequate supply of sugar to the American people.

	Tons.
The Cuban crop for 1920 is estimated at	4,500,000
The local consumption in Cuba amounts to	150,000
Thus leaving for export	4,350,000
Mr. Zabriskie, the president of the United States Sugar Equalization Board, stated before the Senate committee that about one-fourth of this crop had been sold partly to European countries and in part to American refiners; deducting this one-fourth	1,087,500
We have in Cuba, still remaining for export	3,262,500

The Government estimates of the domestic sugar crop of the United States and its possessions are as follows:

	Short tons.
Beet crop, United States	953,000
Louisiana cane crop	138,000
Hawaiian cane crop	600,000
Porto Rican cane crop	300,000
Total	1,991,000
Reduced to long tons this domestic crop would be	1,777,700
Adding Cuban crop, now available for purchase and export	3,262,500
Leaves a total for distribution in this country of	5,040,200
(To this may be added such portion of the Cuban crop as has already been purchased by refiners in this country, and also such portion of the Philippine crop as may be brought to this country.)
The estimated consumption of sugar in this country for the current year amounts to about	4,260,000
Thus leaving a surplus of	780,200

By the mere purchase, therefore, of the remaining unsold portion of the Cuban crop, either by the refineries or by the United States Sugar Equalization Board, this country will have an adequate supply of sugar and the Cuban price will control in our markets as it has always done.

The present scarcity of sugar is only temporary. It was brought about by the longshoremen strike, which tied up more than 100,000 tons of sugar in the Atlantic ports and put out of commission many ships engaged in this trade. This caused our refineries to shut down for several weeks because of the want of raw material.

This strike has been settled, the seaboard refineries are now running day and night, and, besides, the domestic beet sugars are now being placed upon the market.

The Cuban crop begins to move about January 1, and it is only a question of a week or 10 days when this country will have an ample supply of sugar, and the present famine will be relieved.

Mr. Speaker, if this great war has taught one lesson that the American people should take to heart it is that it is only by the encouragement of our own industries that we can ever hope to become independent of the world.

It is but poor encouragement to the cane and beet producers of this country to say to them: "You can raise cane and beets, but before you can convert it into sugar you must first get a license from the Government. And after you have made it into sugar you can not dispose of it as you see fit, but you must dispose of it in such manner as may be directed by a board, known as the United States Sugar Equalization Board. This board will tell you not only when, where, and to whom this sugar shall be shipped, but it will also relieve you of the trouble of fixing a price on your sugar. You shall sell your sugar in such manner and for such price as the equalization board may determine, and if you make any money well and good, but if you lose money and go bankrupt, well, we are sorry, but Uncle Sam has himself gone into the wholesale sugar business, and he will not stand for competition."

This policy of the Government will not tend to encourage and increase the production of sugar in this country, but will tend to demoralize the industry.

The Cubans, who by the way are not under license, will be glad to dispose of their crop in bulk and at a fair price, and the seaboard refiners will be glad to refine these sugars at 2 cents a pound as against 0.6 of a cent a pound before the war.

But the domestic producer is told that he is now put in the class with distillers of whisky, and he must now secure a license before he can even engage in the manufacture of sugar, sirup, or molasses.

Mr. Speaker, there was some excuse for control during the war, but this excuse no longer exists, and I can not believe that this Congress is prepared to single out one great industry in this country for governmental control.

To do this is unfair, unjust, and un-American. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish the gentleman would state what the reason is for the discrepancy in the price of sugar in Louisiana and the State of Michigan.

Mr. MARTIN. If the gentleman will give me time I will try and make it clear. The situation in Louisiana is this: Our normal crop is 300,000 tons. This year we will make less than 100,000 tons. In other words, we have about 25 per cent of a normal crop. Just at the time that this crop came upon the market there was a shortage of sugar in this country, a great scarcity, brought about by the longshoremen's strike, and when we began to harvest our crop people from all sections of the country rushed to Louisiana to buy sugar. They were willing to buy it at any price that we fixed. We had but to name the price. Many of them were offered 25 to 27 cents a pound for their sugar. This matter was brought to the attention of the Attorney General, and he wrote to the United States District Attorney in New Orleans that if any one attempted to sell sugar at any such price he should be prosecuted for profiteering.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has again expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the time for the discussion of this sugar proposition extended 10 minutes on a side. It is one of the most important questions that has come before us, and I think we should have time to get information in respect to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended 10 minutes on each side. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, 10 minutes is not enough. Most of the Members of the House are in just the position that I am. They have conflicting reports in respect to the matter, and I think the House ought not to act hurriedly. I hope the gentleman from New York will make his request 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. SNELL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request and made it 20 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended 20 minutes on a side. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, is there any request for time on either side to take up this additional time?

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I have requests for additional time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Iowa has 28 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Mississippi has 28 minutes remaining.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Louisiana yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has control of the time, not the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Louisiana three minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MARTIN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] asked me a question, and I want to answer that. As I was stating when I was interrupted, this situation was brought to the attention of the Attorney General. He, in turn, instructed the United States district attorney of New Orleans that if any one attempted to sell sugar at any such price he should be prosecuted as a profiteer, or rather he should be called before him and made to explain why he had sold sugar at any such figure, and if the explanation was not satisfactory he should be prosecuted. The two United States Senators from Louisiana and myself heard of this and we went down to see the Attorney General. We asked him if this report was true and he stated it was. He showed us the letter that he had addressed to the United States district attorney. We protested, first, because under the Lever Act all farm products were exempt, and we believed that sugar was a farm product. The United States Attorney General stated that he did not agree with us; that he thought that sugar was a manufactured product. I believe his ruling to be erroneous, but we further said to him that "even admitting what you say is true, that we are manufacturers and not farmers, then you can not convict anyone in Louisiana for the simple reason that a man who sells his sugar for 25 cents a pound, with only 25 per cent of a crop, can not make any money, and if he makes no profit he can not be prosecuted for profiteering." The Attorney General saw the force of this argument, but stated that in view of the fact that he was receiving so many protests from the Southern States against this price of sugar he felt he had to take some action in order to get the price of sugar reduced in Louisiana.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MARTIN. I have not yet gotten through with this answer. I shall be glad to yield when I am through. It was then suggested that as he had a United States district attorney in New Orleans, who lived near the sugar district, that that United States district attorney and the producers in that State should get together and make some agreement whereby there would not be any charge of profiteering in Louisiana in respect to the sale of sugar. That was done. The United States district attorney met with the sugar producers of Louisiana. The producers laid the facts before him. He had the assistance of two ex-Senators from Louisiana. The producers showed him the size of the crop and what it had cost them to produce it, and after going over all of the facts and figures they came to the conclusion that any man in the State of Louisiana who sold sugar at a price not exceeding 17 cents a pound would not be profiteering, and that a great majority of them at that price would lose money. The sugar producers of Louisiana then voluntarily agreed that they would not sell any sugar in that State at more than 17 cents a pound for clarified sugar and 18 cents a pound for refined sugar.

The district attorney stated that if they did not he was going to call them before him to show cause why they should not be held as profiteers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was there anything said in the consideration of the sugar question about the low price in Michigan as to how it happened they could sell in Michigan at 7 and 8 cents where it was selling, say, in Louisiana at 17 cents?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know, but I am informed that at 10 or 11 cents in Michigan you are making more money than at 17 in Louisiana, because we are not making any.

Mr. DUPRÉ. In view of that fact, is it not a fact that a great many sugar producers have been selling a large part of their crop at less than that?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does not the gentleman know some have been doing that?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; I have sold some myself.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman in his remarks to say as one of the reasons why they did not want this extension granted that about the first of January there would be plenty of sugar for all. What facts has the gentleman to place before the House to substantiate that statement? That is the thing we are specially interested in.

Mr. MARTIN. I will give them to the gentleman.

Mr. DALLINGER. While the gentleman is waiting for his figures may I ask him this question? I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana whether or not he is in favor of so much of this bill, that part of this bill down to the proviso on page 5 which I understand authorizes the purchase of this Cuban crop?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, I am. I have no objection, and I stated in my remarks that I have no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. If the gentleman will yield for a further question. With the licensing provision embodied in section 5 of the Food Control Act reenacted in this bill as proposed by the House Committee on Agriculture, whether or not that would not give the Sugar Equalization Board and the President the right to control exports of refined sugar from the United States?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If I understood the gentleman correctly he said the price of sugar in Louisiana was regulated by the price of sugar in Cuba?

Mr. MARTIN. I said the price of sugar all over the country was regulated by the Cuban price.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then what difference would the volume of the production in Louisiana have one way or the other?

Mr. MARTIN. It has very little.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman speaks——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANDLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes allotted to me I want to call the attention of the House to the Senate bill and to the amendments offered to that bill by the Committee on Agriculture, and I will say that this is a unanimous report from our committee. There was no division in the committee in regard to this bill. We felt that it ought to be passed. This bill is Senate bill 3284, and if the Members of the House have not copies of this bill, if you will look on page 359 of the RECORD of December 10 you will find the bill set out, with the exception that an amendment was adopted in the Senate that is not there printed. Now, the first amendment, and the main one, by the Committee on Agriculture is found on page 2 of the Senate bill, wherein the Senate repeals the provision of the food-control bill providing for the licensing feature. Now, here is the difference between the House committee and the Senate in regard to this bill: The Senate gave authority to the Sugar Equalization Board to buy the Cuban sugar; it then repeals the licensing feature and does not give the Sugar Equalization Board the authority and the right to control the sugar after it has been purchased. The Committee on Agriculture felt that the control of the sugar should remain in the hands of this Sugar Equalization Board, and therefore they not only struck out the provisions repealing the licensing feature, but they reinserted it affirmatively in the bill and provided that the Sugar Equalization Board should use the licensing feature of the food-control act during the life of this act. The object of that is simply this: If we go to Cuba and buy 3,000,000 tons of sugar and bring it into the United States and sell it through the refineries and the wholesale dealers and do not in some way control them in the price that they shall make to the retailers and the retailers to the consumers, why, the price of sugar will go sky-high. We are simply bringing in here 3,000,000 tons of sugar upon which the dealers in sugar throughout the country can profiteer for the next 9 or 10 months. Now, then, we felt that with this provision in the bill and this safeguard thrown around it, that we can afford to authorize the Sugar Equalization Board to purchase this sugar.

Now, again: We retain in the bill the Senate provision which says that the provisions of this act shall expire as to domestic sugar on September 30, 1920. That is left in the bill. We leave in the Senate bill the last provision of the bill relating to the doing away with the zone system. That is prohibited, and in that regard the House committee and the Senate are in full accord.

So those are the provisions, Mr. Speaker, of the bill as it is presented here to the House this afternoon for consideration.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUBEY. I will.

Mr. WELLING. I came in since the discussion began. I would like to know if it is true that the Department of Justice has authorized the sale of the Louisiana crop at a price of from 17 to 25 cents a pound?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. That has already been explained on the floor of the House, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] eight minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I shall say little, if anything, in regard to the sugar situation in the country. I think it is pretty well understood, and I believe everyone present realizes that something should be done respecting it.

As far as I am concerned, and as far as I know the opinions of others, what we are offering by this bill does not promise very much, because we are really offering nothing that is not now statute law. We are giving the President no authority that he has not had for more than two years; the authority he has had under the act of August 10, 1917. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is simply a suggestion to the President, a sort of polite request to him, to exercise the authority which up to this time he has failed to exercise. The bill reads:

The President is authorized to continue.

The Senate bill, as it was drafted, had the word "directed"—

That the President is authorized and directed.

The word "directed" was stricken out. I understand the President of the United States is never "directed" to do anything. He is "authorized" and "permitted" to do so-and-so, as Congress may determine or wish to suggest.

Now, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] have said, this bill is like the Senate bill, with one exception. The first portion of it is a suggestion to the President that he act; that he use the authority, which up to this time he has failed to use, to put into action the Sugar Equalization Board, that it may purchase sugar and distribute it throughout the country. The bill before us, offered by the House committee, differs from the Senate in this, that the Senate bill has a provision which refuses permission to the President to exercise the power carried in section 5 of the food-control act. That is the section which carries the licensing provisions.

If the bill should pass as it came from the Senate, and the President should assume to act under the rest of the bill, he would not be able to use or permit the Sugar Equalization Board to use the licensing feature of the food-control act. The House committee believes that if anything is to be accomplished under this bill; if the President should finally, ultimately, some day be induced to act, little, if anything, can be done unless he be permitted to invoke the power conferred upon him by section 5, to license the manufacturers, dealers, and distributors of sugar.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me until I finish my statement. We believe that any good work that can possibly be done must be done under the licensing feature. And the Committee on Agriculture recommends that it not only shall not be repealed, as the Senate bill provides, but that its life shall be extended, that the section shall not be permitted to die with the proclamation of peace. Our bill extends the life of the section to December 31, 1920.

Mr. LUCE. I have in my hand the annual report of the American Sugar Refining Co. for 1918, in which the statement is made in effect that the licensing feature of this board in 1918 did not reduce the consumption of sugar. The only effect, so far as it appears, was to produce great hardship in certain parts of the country, and increase consumption in other parts of the country that had not previously consumed the maximum. Will the gentleman point out where the continuance of the life of this board will result in anything else except the repetition of the hardship and injury caused by the existence of the board for two years?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think with the existing and threatened shortage of sugar, and the fact that in one part of the country the price of 9 cents a pound prevails, in another part 10½ cents, and in still another part 17 cents, there should be some authority in the equalization board to control the sugar business even to the extent of controlling prices, as it will be able to do under the licensing system.

The members of the equalization board have evidently changed their minds since making the report from which the gentleman from Massachusetts quotes, because they told the Senate committee that this act would be of no value unless they were permitted to work under the licensing section of the food-control act, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House received a telegram from the president or chairman of the equalization board telling him that the passage of this bill would produce little, if any, good unless the board were permitted to operate under section 5 of the food-control act.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. In just a moment. This amendment of the Committee on Agriculture of the House would extend also the life of section 10 of the food-control act, which is the commandeering section, by which the President of the United States in an emergency is permitted to commandeer sugar and other food products and to provide for their distribution. We think it is proper to continue that and not let it die with the proclamation of peace, which may come before the 31st of December, 1920.

Mr. Speaker, we have put these amendments into the bill so that the power of the present law, the teeth of the present law, may be retained to give the President and the equalization board all possible authority, or in this way urge upon their attention that they have this authority, so that there will be no excuse in the future for the inaction that they have been guilty of up to this time. They have been talking about lack of authority. They have come before Congress and asked for something that they already have. We are giving them all they ask for, and more, so that if nothing is done the fault will lie with them and not with us.

As I say, I do not look for every much good to come of this because of the failure and refusal of the administration to act up to this time. But we are by this bill practically reenacting a statute which has been on the books for more than two years, giving them and continuing to them all the power they ask, and more, and if nothing is done from this time on, the fault will not lie with Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is the opinion of the gentleman and his committee that if the President does have large powers under this act the price of sugar will not be unduly enhanced?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It gives the President, under the Sugar Equalization Board, authority to control the manufacture, distribution, and use of sugar, and under that power the prices can be controlled. If a license is issued, it can contain all kinds of conditions, to the effect that the sugar will be sold in such and such a way, in such and such quantity, for such and such prices. Under that power, if it is exercised, the price can be controlled.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have that authority to-day.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think this bill should pass, although it only accomplishes one thing, and that would be to bring about the purchase by this board of the Cuban sugar.

Last August seven members of this board out of eight began to persist with the President in the attempt to procure his authority to purchase the Cuban sugar. But, true to form, the President listened to one member out of eight—he evidently did; and, in another way true to form, he has pursued the "watchful-waiting" policy to such an extent that he has not to-day answered the request of the seven members of the Sugar Board. If any board up to that time had deserved the gratitude of the people of the United States for the way they had handled the war measures, in my judgment it was the Sugar Board. Everybody knows that there had not been an increase in the price of sugar up to that date, as there had been on other articles, and the board had accumulated $30,000,000 in the Treasury and had not worked a hardship on anyone.

Mr. Speaker, I want in this brief time to answer one other proposition that has been advanced here, so that no Member will misunderstand. The Department of Justice has no authority to fix the price of sugar anywhere. The Department of Justice under the food-control law had the authority, and it was its duty, to prosecute profiteering, and there is nothing unusual and nothing strange about the fact that the Attorney General of the United States has said to the people of Louisiana who produce sugar, "You can charge 17 cents and not be profiteers," and at the same time has said to the people of Kansas who produce sugar, "You can charge only 11 cents, and if you charge more you will be profiteers."

I say there is nothing strange in the administration's attitude on that question. But this committee is inserting the license clause in the bill, so that the board, if permitted to function, can go ahead and control the price of sugar fairly and equitably in the United States, and will not have to be dependent on the Department of Justice to prosecute profiteers in order to control the price of sugar. I want to say to the membership of this House that in every instance where we have depended upon the Department of Justice to control prices by enforcing the antiprofiteering law it has been an absolute failure. I beg of you to pass this bill as the committee reported it to you. [Applause.]

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINCHER. I would yield, but my time has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, what I am interested to find out with regard to this licensing system is this: As I understand, you are going to extend the present licensing system. Under that system the man who wants to go to the corner grocery and buy two or three pounds of sugar for his family can not get it, because the grocer can not buy it and sell it at the price that the committee say he must pay; but the manufacturer can go into the field and buy any number of tons to manufacture candy or something else. What I want to have put into this law is something that will protect the family and the domestic use of sugar.

Mr. HAUGEN. The board has the power now. The fact that it has not exercised it is up to the board, of course.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. All my time is allotted. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] yield to me for a question?

Mr. DALLINGER. I have only three minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I will not take over a half a minute.

Mr. DALLINGER. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe we ought to license the people who have to deal in sugar?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will explain that.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say that I do not, and I think it is the most iniquitous thing that we could undertake to do.

Mr. DALLINGER. On October 16 I introduced a bill (H. R. 9976) to prohibit the exportation of sugar from the United States or from any place subject to its jurisdiction for the period of six months. This bill, which was designed to meet an emergency, was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The first hearing on the bill was to-day, and the further consideration of this and other sugar bills was continued until Friday, so that apparently nothing will be done before the Christmas recess in the way of compulsory legislation by Congress stopping sugar going out of the country.

Now, what are the facts in regard to the sugar situation in the United States?

SUMMARY OF THE FACTS IN REGARD TO SUGAR.

During the first four or five months of the year 1919 it seemed probable that the United States would have plenty of sugar. The Sugar Equalization Board itself sold 150,000 tons for export, and they permitted sugar refiners to accept export orders for sugar.

During the latter part of May and the month of June, however, the situation changed completely. By July 1 it became apparent that the world's sugar production would be short 2,000,000 tons. Accordingly the equalization board ordered the refiners to stop accepting orders for export, and also borrowed 50,000 tons of sugar which had been allotted to the British commission with the expectation that it could be paid back later.

On August 1 the Sugar Equalization Board made the following recommendations: First, that the board be given the power to license all sugar dealers, together with the power to examine their books; second, that the board be given the power of distribution and rationing; and, third, that the board be given the power to prohibit the exportation of sugar—that is, to put in force an embargo. I understand from the equalization board that these recommendations were referred by the President to the Secretary of Agriculture, who, on the advice of so-called experts, decided to take no action in the matter.

On August 14 the Sugar Equalization Board advised the President that the Cuban commissioners had offered to the American Government the entire Cuban sugar crop for the year 1920, the average price at that time being about 6½ cents per pound, and called attention to the fact that the Cuban commission should be advised at an early date as to whether our Government proposed to consider this offer. Not receiving any reply from this communication, on September 20, 1919, the Sugar Equalization Board called the President's attention to the fact that unless some action was taken at once it would be impossible for the United States to control the Cuban sugar crop for the year 1920. If the President had heeded these communications of the Sugar Equalization Board and given his assent to the purchase of the Cuban sugar crop, the present situation would not have arisen.

THE PRESENT SITUATION.

The sugar situation at the present time in many parts of the country is very acute, and immediate action should be taken by Congress.

From January 1 to November 1 the total exportations of sugar from the United States amounted to 1,246,869,413 pounds, making a monthly average of 124,686,941 pounds, which would be 1¼ pounds a month for every man, woman, and child in the United States. In addition to this, 22,000,000 pounds in the warehouses of the American Expeditionary Forces at the time of the armistice were sold by order of the Secretary of War to the French Government at an average price of 2½ cents per pound.

The prohibition of further export orders by the Sugar Equalization Board has not prevented the sugar refiners from continuing to fill export orders already on their books, and, more important still, it has not prevented and is not preventing the export of resale sugar. For instance, a broker in New York has been and still is as free to buy sugar for a consumer in London as for a consumer in Chicago. After it leaves the refinery there is no means of tracing where the sugar goes, as it may be resold from broker to broker. In the month of October over 9,000 tons of this resale sugar was exported from the United States.

According to the Sugar Equalization Board, the wholesalers, instead of supplying their retail trade so that the family sugar bowl can be kept replenished, have been selling their stocks at high prices to confectioners, condensed-milk manufacturers, chocolate manufacturers, manufacturers of preserves, and a large part of the finished product has been and still is being exported.

I am aware that men engaged in the sugar business are very likely to treat a lot of 1,000 tons of sugar as practically negligible. From the point of view of the American consumer, however, it should be borne in mind that 1,000 tons means that 1,000,000 housewives who are to-day asking for 2 pounds of sugar to fill the family sugar bowl will be able to get it. A lot of 50,000 tons, which was the amount borrowed by the Sugar Equalization Board from the British supply, would furnish 2 pounds apiece to 50,000,000 American citizens.

Mr. Speaker, such in brief are the facts in the case. The present situation is serious. Sugar and sugar products are going out of the country. An emergency exists and nothing is being done. Personally I would like to see Congress pass an embargo bill even if it was only for 60 days, to stop sugar from going out of this country. [Applause.] I believe that the American people would like to see such a bill passed. [Applause.]

But it seems impossible to secure the passage of a separate sugar embargo bill in time to do any good. Therefore as long as this bill is here and has been amended by the Committee on Agriculture so as to give some governmental agency the power to prohibit further exports of sugar, and there is a strong probability that it may become a law, I shall vote for it. I am frank to say, however, that I would like to see an amendment adopted giving to the Sugar Equalization Board the power to regulate and prohibit exports regardless of the President, or I would like to see an amendment to the first section adopted adding the words "and directed," so that the section as amended would read "the President is authorized and directed," and so forth. Nevertheless, I recognize that under suspension of the rules no amendment is permissible at this time and that this bill must pass just as it comes from the hands of the committee or not at all. Inasmuch, however, as this is the only chance we have of securing legislation to stop sugar going out of the country and to furnish the American consumer with an adequate supply of sugar at a reasonable price, I am in favor of this bill and trust that it will pass.

Mr. CANDLER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I am in entire sympathy with the views expressed by the gentleman that this bill, with the licensing provision as we have brought it in here, will, indirectly at least, control the export situation. The Sugar Equalization Board, through the licensing power, can absolutely control the exports of the 3,000,000 tons of sugar that they are to bring in here from Cuba.

By unanimous consent Mr. DALLINGER, Mr. TINCHER, and Mr. HAUGEN were given leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I desire to congratulate this Committee on Agriculture on having performed a real public service in bringing this measure before the House. The question involved is one which concerns every household in America, and immediate action is necessary if we are to prevent great hardship being inflicted upon the people.

No more gigantic opportunity to exploit the public need could be imagined than that which will be offered to profiteers if no action is taken. The average annual consumption of sugar in this country is 8,000,000,000 pounds. If gamblers and speculators can manipulate the price a single additional cent, they will take $80,000,000 out of the pockets of the American people. If they can, through their juggling tactics, increase the price 10 cents a pound, they will add $800,000,000 to the food bill of this country.

Will they do it? I sincerely believe that if this measure is not passed and if all restrictions are removed on January 1, as will be done if no action is taken by Congress, the price of sugar will be around 30 cents a pound by March 1, and a new crop of millionaires will be made at the expense of the people of America.

The United States Sugar Equalization Board has made grave mistakes, it is true. I have been in almost daily touch with that board for the past three months and have followed its work closely. During the war period it acted wisely, and I believe its regulation and control of sugar kept the price down to a very considerable degree.

Then came the opportunity for the board to purchase the Cuban crop at a price of about 6½ cents a pound. The question was put up to the President, with favorable recommendation on the part of seven members and a dissenting opinion by one member. Apparently the President followed the solitary adviser; at least, he failed to request that the crop be purchased by the board, and the opportunity was lost.

That was a serious mistake, and its results will be measured in terms of dollars and cents in every home in America during the coming year.

Another mistake was the zoning system put into operation by the board. They arbitrarily established zones and ordered that certain kinds of sugar be used wholly to supply great districts, without regard to the actual relation of the production of such sugars to the needs of the districts.

For instance, the Pittsburgh district was put within the eastern zone and was ordered to secure its supply from eastern refiners. Shortly after this order went into effect I was deluged with complaints from dealers in the Pittsburgh district who were unable to get sugar. I took it up at once with the board and was promised that Pittsburgh would get exactly the same quantity as was received during the last four months of 1918.

Everybody was satisfied, because it was assumed that the promise meant that the same amount would be received as was received from all sources. But when I found that only a small fraction of the actual amount was being received and called upon the equalization board for action, I learned that it was planning to ship only the same amount from eastern refineries, regardless of the fact that three-fourths of the supply for Pittsburgh came last year from the beet-sugar refineries of the West. It was only after repeated efforts and long delay that I was able to secure an allotment of beet sugar for Pittsburgh, while other districts in the beet-sugar zone had an oversupply.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this measure before us abolishes the zone system in distribution and will end that mistaken policy. I believe it will also compel action in the purchase of that part of the Cuban crop which remains, even though the price paid must of necessity be much greater than was required last August.

The House Committee on Agriculture has also amended the Senate bill by providing that sections 5 and 10 of the food-control act shall be in effect as applied to sugar. These are licensing and requisitioning features, and without them this measure would be of little practical value. If the Cuban crop were purchased and brought to this country and the refiners were left to act without restrictions, the public would gain nothing. There would simply be an open invitation to all to profiteer to their hearts' content.

I appeared before the Agriculture Committee to urge the insertion of the licensing feature because I want to see some real benefits come from this legislation. It is easy to talk in aphorisms, as we have heard here to-day, and to proclaim that the "free play of the law of supply and demand" will solve such a problem. That famous old law of "supply and demand" has been nullified by profiteers in food products. They have locked up the supply in warehouses and storehouses; they have exported great quantities overseas and kept it from the people of this country. The supply, manipulated in such fashion, does not affect the price and neither does the demand from hungry people. Since the law of "supply and demand" is being nullified, it is better to have it done by the Government, representing all the people, than by the profiteers, exploiting all the people.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time to take drastic steps to end the activities of black-flag profiteers in the necessaries of life. They are as dangerous in their defiance of law and fundamental Americanism as are the red radicals who preach violent overthrow of this Government. Both despise the law and both would establish minority rule.

Without the passage of this measure there will be unbridled profiteering and unlimited gambling in sugar next year. We can prevent that by licensing every man that deals in sugar and making sure that unjust, unreasonable, and discriminatory prices and practices are not indulged in. This measure is drastic, but it is necessary. It is broad enough to cover, I believe, the diverting of great quantities of sugar, needed by the people on their own tables, to candy manufacturers and soft-drink makers, whose products are luxuries, for which high prices can be secured. The conditions make such an act as this necessary, and it should pass this House by a unanimous vote.

Mr. CANDLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON].

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Speaker, were it not for the fact that this bill has been brought in under a suspension of the rules, thereby making it impossible to amend, I would offer an amendment to the bill that would, to my mind, prevent the distribution of sugar in such a way as has in the past caused much complaint from those who desire sugar for domestic use. The amendment I had prepared reads as follows:

Provided, That in the distribution of sugar the reasonable necessities of wholesale grocers supplying retail grocers be given preference.

I venture to hope that the conference committee will consider the wisdom of incorporating in the bill a provision that will bring about the result I had hoped to attain by the passage of such an amendment.

I have been in correspondence by mail for over two months with the Sugar Equalization Board. In addition to this, I have sent the board several telegrams and communicated with Mr. H. K. Hall, an assistant to Mr. Lowry, over the telephone, this last-named method being the only way I could get a reply during the past 10 days, as replies to my letters of December 6 and 13 and my telegram of December 6 have not been received. I appealed to Mr. Hall over the telephone to permit the Federal fair-price commissioner at Baltimore to distribute eight carloads of sugar that had been there for more than a week and had not been distributed by the board. He said it could not be done in that way, but would have to go through the regular route. I insisted that something be done to get this sugar to the people, and Mr. Hall replied, "Mr. BENSON, you must recognize that we own that sugar." I said, "Who are we?" He replied, "The equalization board." I asked him who owned the stock in the equalization board, and his reply was, "The President of the United States." I then told Mr. Hall that I considered it a great piece of impertinence for him, an employee of the equalization board, to say that "We, the equalization board, own this sugar, and that therefore we are going to distribute it as we say."

When people in New York attempt to distribute sugar to consumers in Baltimore, and they allot 827 bags to the Coca-Cola Co., 525 bags to George Bloom & Sons, 248 bags to Guth Chocolate Co., 600 bags to Lauer & Suter Co., 1,950 bags to Stewart, Son & Co., 100 bags to Headley Chocolate Co., and similar amounts to other candy and soft-drink manufacturers, and allot 292 bags to J. A. Edmondson and 50 bags to H .Pfeil Co., two houses that have gone out of business, while they allot to the Grocers' Service Bureau, a large corporation, having approximately 850 retail grocers to supply, only 25 bags, I say that that is an experience in distribution that does not work out well.

Mr. MARTIN. Who made that distribution?

Mr. BENSON. The equalization board in New York. I have appealed to the board to distribute the sugar that was allotted to the two firms in Baltimore that have gone out of business, and suggested that their quota be allotted to the Grocers' Service Bureau. This request was made on December 13, but I have received no answer to date. The people in Baltimore are suffering for sugar largely because it has not been fairly distributed in Baltimore, not because of a failure to get the sugar to that city, and unless some plan is devised to take care of the wholesale grocers who supply the retail grocers, the ultimate distributors to those who desire sugar for domestic use, it can not be fairly distributed through New York.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENSON. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Will this bill remedy the situation the gentleman is speaking of?

Mr. BENSON. Not to my mind.

Mr. SNELL. That is the question that I am interested in.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, what we hope to do under the provisions of this bill is to remedy some of the inequalities that are complained of by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON]. What I am personally interested in more than anything else is to provide some means by law whereby the people of this country themselves in their homes and on their tables may acquire sugar at a reasonable price, and be protected from profiteering, now seemingly being indulged in in this home necessity. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is there any possibility of holding down the price of sugar? I have been over to my office since this discussion has been going on, and I found there two letters from two ladies in two different parts of my district saying that they are being charged 25 cents a pound for sugar, and sometimes as high as 28 cents.

Mr. CANDLER. I think it is outrageous that those ladies were required to pay such an exorbitant price for sugar, and the object of this bill is to reduce the price of sugar, and we hope, if passed, it will accomplish that result.

Mr. EMERSON rose.

Mr. CANDLER. I can not yield. I am sorry that we can not discuss a means of furnishing sugar to the people of this country in their homes at a reasonable price without some one attacking the President of the United States. I regret that my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] and my genial friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] found it necessary even in the discussion of this great domestic question to attack the President of the United States and the Democratic administration. As was suggested by a very able and distinguished gentleman who preceded me in a speech to-day, on another subject, it seems that there is no occasion under any circumstances or anywhere but that some one feels that it is his duty to make a partisan attack on the great head of the Government of the United States and his administration which is in power by the will of the people.

I hope that some time we may be able to go into some question which all the membership of this House will be willing to settle upon some great patriotic basis in the interest of all of the American people without Members attacking the President of the United States, who is, at last, the President of us all regardless of party, and the President of all the people. I assert that he has done, and is now doing, and will continue to do, so long as he remains in the Executive chair of this great Republic, everything possible in the interest of all the people of the United States. He does not suffer by your puny attacks, but you will find you and your party will suffer if you continue to attack him without "rhyme or reason," on any and all occasions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. I am very sorry I can not yield at this moment. I hope to be able to yield to my good friend a little later. It is complained that the President did not act. It is true that the sugar question was brought to his attention by this equalization board on the 20th of August last. There was a division of opinion in the equalization board. It is true that the majority did recommend that action be taken at that time. Mr. Taussig, a member of the board, recommended that action be not taken at that time. The President was considering the matter, and during his consideration of it he became, as you know, and as I know, sick and temporarily unable to consider the public business during some time, and none, by the direction of his eminent physicians, was brought to his attention. I think it is time to stop this unjust and partisan criticism of the President of the United States on every occasion and about everything when, without the fault and beyond the power of the President, in God's providence and wisdom, He saw proper to inflict upon him serious illness, which to some extent still continues. Thank God, however, he is rapidly improving, and I pray the good Lord that he may soon be entirely well, and you know when he is well he can take care of you and all your criticism. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is charged that the President is the cause of this trouble because he did not take action. Let us see. In the hearings before the Senate committee we get some information on the subject. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 10 last, at page 360, a statement from the Senate hearings before their committee, to which attention was called by Senator HARRISON, of Mississippi, during the discussion in the Senate:

Mr. HARRISON. I read from the hearings, on page 108. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked this question:

"Senator NORRIS. If the President had authorized you, would you have done it?"

Speaking of the purchase of the Cuban sugar crop.

"Mr. GLASGOW. No, sir; not until Congress had given us the powers and they thought it proper. It would come back at last to the discretion of Congress as to whether they desired the distribution of sugar continued."

Mr. Glasgow, the gentleman making that statement, was the general attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board, and as such spoke by authority.

Therefore, if the President had acted at that time, the general attorney stated that the board would not have acted and would not have bought the sugar without the authority of Congress. The Senate had this matter under consideration from October 3, and for more than 10 weeks were considering it; and, because of the fact that the matter was pending in the Senate committee and in the Senate and they were threatening, at least, to legislate upon it, the refiners and people who deal largely in sugar refused to go into the market and buy the crop of Cuban sugar and refine it and give the people the benefit of it for fear the Government would take action and take it away from them and convert and distribute it under Government control and supervision. Therefore it was the Senate of the United States that held up the situation, for the Congress of the United States had the authority and power to act. You who are in control of legislation in the House and responsible for it failed to act and the Senate failed to act, and this condition has arisen which confronts us to-day. Some Member asked to know whether or not there was any sugar in sight, whether it can be obtained at the present time. I read the following statement from a speech of Senator GAY, of Louisiana, delivered in the Senate on December 12 last:

	Tons.
The Cuban crop for 1920 is estimated at	4,500,000
The local consumption in Cuba amounts to	150,000
Thus leaving for export	4,350,000
Mr. Zabriskie, the president of the United States Sugar Equalization Board, stated before our committee that about one-fourth of this crop had been sold, partly to European countries and in part to American refiners; deducting this one-fourth, or	1,087,500
We have in Cuba, still remaining for export	3,262,500

The Government estimates of the domestic sugar crop of the United States and its possessions are as follows:

	Short tons.
Beet crop, United States	953,000
Louisiana cane crop	138,000
Hawaiian cane crop	600,000
Porto Rican cane crop	300,000
Total	1,991,000

SUGAR SHORTAGE.	Tons.
Reduced to long tons, this domestic crop would be	1,777,700
Adding Cuban crop now available for purchase and export	3,262,500
Leaves a total for distribution in this country of (To this may be added such portion of the Cuban crop as has already been purchased by refiners in this country, and also such portion of the Philippine crop as may be brought to this country.)	5,040,200
The estimated consumption of sugar in this country for the current year amounts to about	4,260,000
Thus leaving a surplus of	780,200

This statement conclusively shows there is sugar available, and the question is whether or not under this bill you will give authority to the equalization board to purchase it in order that they may control and distribute it in this country, and by the exercise of the powers conferred in this bill reduce the price of sugar to the consumer upon his table and enable him to get sugar. [Applause.]

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. I will.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Has the gentleman heard any opposition to the purchase of the Cuban sugar crop expressed on this floor by gentlemen who do not favor the licensing feature of this bill?

Mr. CANDLER. No; but it is not being purchased by American interests, and we are trying to provide a way to purchase it for the benefit of all the people.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Therefore the gentleman's argument is extremely pointed.

Mr. CANDLER. Yes; pointed in showing that there is sugar available for purchase. Some Members wanted to know how much sugar there was, and I am simply giving the statement here from a competent source, from one of the gentleman's own Senators, Senator GAY, of Louisiana, showing the amount of available sugar that could be acquired in case the authority is given to the equalization board to purchase the sugar.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will yield, what would be the result if this law was not passed, if the equalization board were discontinued? Would it not result in very high prices and a monopoly of sugar?

Mr. CANDLER. I think the gentleman is entirely correct. Indications at least are that it would go higher and higher, as it is doing at the present time, and it would go sky high as soon as all Government control is taken away from it. Now, then, this bill provides for the continuance of this equalization board. Then it provides further for the striking out of the provisions of the Senate bill which eliminate the licensing feature and reinserting the licensing feature in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. In a moment or so. As was stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], if that feature were left out of the bill, then if sugar should be purchased by the equalization board and brought into this country and they sold it and turned it loose upon the market of this country to the wholesaler without any control, they could not regulate the price at which it would be sold to the retailer or the consumer, but under the licensing feature they could control the price at which it was sold to the wholesaler, and they could control the price at which it would be sold by the wholesaler to the retailer, and therefore control the price in this country at which it was sold to the consumer and in that way see that the consumer had the opportunity to purchase the sugar at a reasonable price.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman favor the control of all the businesses in the United States under the licensing system?

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman from Illinois very well knows I do not.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman's argument would indicate that he was in favor of controlling——

Mr. CANDLER. I am in favor of taking the power and control of the Government off of private enterprise in this country and restoring normal conditions at the very earliest moment that it is possible to do it, but in an emergency like this here confronting us, when the people of this country are being imposed upon not only in the price paid but in getting possession at all of one of the real everyday necessities which is demanded upon their table, then I think the power of the Congress should be exercised and exercised promptly, in order that the general public may be protected.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the wise thing to have been done by the committee of which the gentleman is a distinguished member would be to bring in a bill here to repeal the war power now held by the President and all the other boards under his jurisdiction——

Mr. CANDLER. Well, all the war powers expire when the treaty of peace is ratified and the President of the United States shall by proclamation proclaim that peace has been established, and the war power will not be entirely taken away or expire until peace is secured by the ratification of a treaty which will terminate the war. May God speed the day when peace universal is realized by all mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman favor an equalization board for the purpose of holding down the price and distribution of cotton?

Mr. CANDLER. When an emergency exists as it is here it will be time enough to consider that question, but it does not exist now, and it has not existed in the past. The farmers are not getting full value for their cotton now. There is a world shortage of cotton, and a small crop in this country, and, of course, that has advanced the price.

Mr. MARTIN. What does cotton sell for now?

Mr. CANDLER. Not as much as it is really worth, all things considered——

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Under the administration of affairs as they exist now, how does it come that we have such a scarcity of sugar and high price of sugar with this board of equalization existing and functioning at the present time? If it is not successful now, would it be if we were to retain it?

Mr. CANDLER. Because they really ceased to function so far as the available crop is concerned. If they had actively continued in operation they would have brought to this country the sugar available at the present time, but because of the failure of the Congress that had the power to act, and because of the fact that the necessary legislation was held up by the Senate of the United States for a long time, and because no final action has been taken up to the present time, we find ourselves in the condition that exists to-day, and another reason was suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] in his speech, and that was that the strike of the longshoremen when they refused to unload ships loaded with sugar caused the loaded ships to remain for quite a while in the ports, thus creating the first scarcity of sugar. I have shown by the statement I read awhile ago that there is plenty of sugar available. The question is, Will you pass this bill and thereby make an effort to secure it and get it to the people and provide means to see that they not only get the sugar but get it at a reasonable price?

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. May I ask another question? If we had no Sugar Equalization Board during the past year, would not we have had plenty of sugar now at reasonable prices?

Mr. CANDLER. Oh, no. Certainly, the equalization board did not keep any sugar out of this country and did not keep anybody from buying sugar who wanted to buy it. If the people who deal in sugar and refine it for sale wanted to buy sugar and had been willing to do so, they could have gone into the markets and bought it. There was no limitation upon them and no prohibition upon them which prevented them from buying sugar. The reason the refiners and the people who usually handle the sugar by private enterprise did not buy, I understand, was because this bill was pending in the Senate and being held up, and they were afraid to go into the market in view of that fact and buy for private enterprise. The trouble was caused by delay in passing necessary legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if it is wise to extend the licensing system to the question of sugar why it would not be wise to extend the licensing system to cotton. Is he in favor of putting cotton under the licensing system?

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] just asked that question a moment ago, and the gentleman from Illinois simply repeats it; that is all. I told the gentleman from Louisiana when he asked the question that there was no demand for a licensing system in reference to cotton and no emergency that called for it, and therefore no necessity for it in any part of the country, and I say the same to the gentleman from Illinois. I dare say, however, that there are people in the homes in the district of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and people in the homes in the district of every Member of Congress in the United States to-day who are demanding sugar, and demanding it at a reasonable price, and asking that something be done to protect the people of this country in this sugar emergency. Will you come to their rescue by passing this bill? [Applause.] Complaint has been made of inequality in price in different zones. This bill provides—

That the zone system of sale and distribution of sugars heretofore established by the said United States Sugar Equalization Board shall be abolished and shall not be reestablished or maintained, and that sugars shall be permitted to be sold and to circulate freely in every portion of the United States.

That provision in the bill will abolish the zone system and prevent it being reestablished or maintained, and will equalize prices so that sugar shall be permitted to be sold and circulate freely in every portion of the United States. So with the passage of this bill containing that provision that complaint can and will no longer exist. In the interest of the people, to relieve the situation in the homes, and for the benefit of the general public I appeal to you to promptly pass this bill, so that the relief necessary may come, and may come quickly. Let Congress delay no longer. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, I have but little to say on the subject. It is a matter of very great importance.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. If we can get order, so that I can hear the question of the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he is in favor of putting all the business interests of the United States under the licensing system?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; and anybody that knows me ought to know that without asking the question.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have only five minutes.

Mr. EMERSON. I would like to know——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield if your question is very brief.

Mr. EMERSON. I will make it brief. There is some talk here about an embargo on exportation of sugar. Is this sugar in this country or is it in Cuba? The gentleman knows, and I would like him to answer that question.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, it would be unlawful to put an embargo upon sugar this year, because the contract between the Sugar Equalization Board and Great Britain, France, and Italy is that this corporation purchased the sugar for export from Cuba for this year without competition from those other countries, with the understanding and agreement that this corporation would deliver to England, France, and Italy a proportionate amount of this Cuban sugar. To talk about putting an embargo upon the exportation of sugar while that contract lasts is nonsense. It can not be done.

The gentleman from Mississippi has just given the figures of the consumption and production of sugar in this country, which figures are correct. Our people are the greatest sugar-consuming people in the world, with the single exception of the English people. Our consumption reaches about 81 pounds per capita per year, while that of Great Britain is nearly 100 pounds. Before the war England obtained from Germany and Austria-Hungary very largely her supply of sugar, including what she obtained from this country. We produce 25 per cent of our consumption of sugar in this country from beets and cane and we import 25 per cent of our consumption from our insular possessions—Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. We look to Cuba and the West Indian Islands and South America for the remainder of our consumption of sugar—about one-half of it. There is a shortage in the world's supply of sugar to-day, as reported. Every time the sugar-refining companies of this country want to boost the price of refined sugar they report a shortage in the world's supply of sugar, and up goes the price. It is said there is a shortage of about 3,000,000 tons out of a total production of 17,000,000 tons in the world. I believe the equalization board did good work this year. They kept the price of sugar down to a reasonable point and below that in foreign countries that did not produce their own sugar.

I believe that the equalization board might do some good this coming year if it would purchase the Cuban crop of sugar to-day and control the price, control the distribution to the refiners of the country, and therefore fix the wholesale price in this country as they did last year.

The licensing feature, if I am correct, existed in the law last year, but by contract between the equalization board and the producers of sugar and the wholesalers that licensing feature was not brought into operation, by contract, I say, and therefore the people of the country have had sugar at a fair price. I am opposed to a licensing feature in the control of any of our great industries in the country, those engaged in the production of food or clothing supplies. I believe it will not be applied if the existing law is extended for another year or if the rights under that law by contract are extended.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. May I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more?

The SPEAKER. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the Senate bill as amended.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that in his opinion two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MARTIN. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 128, noes 23.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold that until I can make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request that I made earlier in the day, that the House dispense with business under the Calendar Wednesday rule to-morrow, and that business that was in order on Monday shall be in order to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], with the consent of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN], asks unanimous consent that to-morrow Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with, and that the business in order on Monday be taken up instead. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, that means suspension day to-morrow. What is coming up under suspension?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know what the Speaker has in mind to be recognized, but there are some bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that ought to be passed. There are two bills from the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I am hopeful that we may consider them. There are a number of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made no engagement as to unanimous consent, except that he has promised to recognize a gentleman as to one bill from the Committee on Banking and Currency, and one on a bill for a subtreasury at St. Louis.

Mr. MONDELL. One bill is to make gold certificates a legal tender. The other is a Senate bill to provide for the expenses of the farm-loan banks.

The SPEAKER. The one the Chair had in mind was for making gold certificates a legal tender.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that the other will come up. It is simply on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he will not modify that request and have it apply only to unanimous consent, and then we shall know certainly what is coming up.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MONDELL. My idea was that we could go through the calendar. There is a gold-certificate bill that ought to be passed.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman know of anybody that is going to object to that bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not. No one can tell.

Mr. GARNER. There is a Rules Committee that can obviate that matter, and I do not believe you ought to ask unanimous consent to have suspension day all day to-morrow. That is what it means. It seems to me that it is asking a good deal of the House to ask for the entire day for the suspension of the rules when you do not know what is going to be brought up.

Mr. MONDELL. We did not have suspension of the rules Monday or unanimous consent Monday.

Mr. GARNER. We have had it to-day. We have had two suspensions of the rules. I assume this one is going to pass. I am sorry each of them will have been passed. If the gentleman will make his request apply to unanimous consent, I shall not object. Otherwise I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Unanimous Consent Calendar probably would not take all day to-morrow.

Mr. GARNER. We then can probably take up any subject that came under the rule. I want to have some assurance on that point. If I can have that assurance, I will agree.

Mr. MONDELL. I had in mind two bills. I do not know that the Speaker will recognize either of the gentlemen having them in charge. One of them is in regard to the public building at St. Louis.

Mr. GARNER. We will get an agreement from the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The request is what the Chair has stated.

Mr. MONDELL. One bill is in regard to the Federal building at St. Louis and the other is a bill to make gold certificates a legal tender.

Mr. GARNER. With the understanding that the Unanimous Consent Calendar will be called and that there will be no other motions to suspend the rules except the ones which the gentleman from Wyoming has mentioned, I shall not object.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Is the Federal-building project at St. Louis a new project?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; that is old.

Mr. GARD. The bill for the Federal building at St. Louis may be considered to-night, I suspect, by unanimous consent.

Mr. MONDELL. There are other matters before the House.

The SPEAKER. If the bill is considered by unanimous consent, of course it will not require suspension.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman add the deportation bill to his agreement?

Mr. GARNER. No; I will not agree to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]?

Mr. GARD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects. Does the gentleman from Louisiana make his point of order?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I ask the gentleman to withhold that for one moment. I want to renew the request made by my colleague——

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. There is a motion before the House.

Mr. DYER. It might be done by unanimous consent.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I suggest to the Chair that on the vote there were 128 one way and 23 the other.

The SPEAKER. It does not follow that everybody present voted. The Chair finds that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members. As many as favor suspending the rules and passing the bill will vote yea, those opposed nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 258, nays 34, answered "present" 1, not voting 138, as follows:

FEDERAL OFFICE BUILDING AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 484, to which objection was made but has been withdrawn, be taken up, providing for the erection of a Federal building at St. Louis.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 484. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. ROUSE. I object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 484.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-one Members present; not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 17, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the secretary of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting third annual report of the United States Shipping Board, covering the period June 30, 1918, to and including June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 435); to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the General Land Office for the protection of the so-called Oregon and California railroad lands for the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 520); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Navy submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation, for payment to the Joe Andrews Co., of Los Angeles, Calif., for repair of an automobile damaged while in use by the Navy Department during the influenza epidemic of 1918 (H. Doc. No. 521); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers, with map, on a preliminary examination of San Antonio River, Tex., authorized by the river and harbor act approved July 27, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 522); to the Committee on Flood Control and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of a proposed bill entitled "An act fixing the compensation of certain officials in the Customs Service, and for other purposes" (H. Doc. No. 523); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers, United States Army, together with report of Col. G. R. Lukesh, Corps of Engineers, with map, on preliminary examination of the waterway between Charleston Harbor, S. C., and the North Santee River, by way of Wando River, authorized by the river and harbor act approved March 2, 1919 (H. Doc. 524); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting report showing the average number of employees, including clerks to Members and Delegates, receiving the increased compensation at the rate of $240 per annum during the first four months of the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. 525); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GOOD, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11223) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Employees' Compensation Commission and the Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 502), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10847) granting the consent of Congress to Marion County, State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across the Pearl River in Marion County, State of Mississippi, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 503), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11224) to amend the act entitled "An act to exclude from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes," approved October 16, 1918, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 504), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOOD, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 261) to make immediately available the appropriation for the expenses of regulating further the entry of aliens into the United States, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 505), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAUGEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 506), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GOOD: A bill (H. R. 11223) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Employees' Compensation Commission and the Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 11224) to amend the act entitled "An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes," approved October 16, 1918; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. WEBSTER: A bill (H. R. 11225) making provisions for the irrigation of Indian lands within the limits of the Curlew irrigation district, in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. McFADDEN: A bill (H. R. 11226) to amend an act approved April 23, 1918, entitled "An act to conserve the gold supply of the United States; to permit the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States; to provide silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use; to assist foreign governments at war with the enemies of the United States; and for the above purposes to stabilize the price and encourage the production of silver"; to amend section 3514 of the Revised Statutes establishing the standards of gold and silver coins, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

451. By Mr. YATES: Petition of Champaign-Urbana Typographical Union No. 444, Champaign, Ill., urging that Congress take such steps as may immediately end the differences between the operators and miners, the miners' demands may be equitably settled, the mines opened, the miners given a fair and honest wage, the operators a reasonable profit, and the public a square deal; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

452. Also, petition of A. W. Williams, Quincy, Ill., reciting that the Cummins bill appears to take away from such roads as earned more than a stipulated percentage on their real value a substantial proportion of the excess, and urging that a law of this kind if applied to business generally would be very disastrous; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

453. Also, petition of Dr. T. J. Dunn and Mrs. Anna Dunn, Dieterich, Ill., reciting that the Cummins bill, if enacted into law, would end all railroad enterprise; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 17, 1919.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, December 16, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McKellar	Simmons
Bankhead	Harris	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Harrison	McNary	Smith, Md.
Capper	Henderson	Moses	Smith, S. C.

Gay	La Follette	Ransdell	Wolcott
Gerry	Lenroot	Sheppard
Gronna	McCormick	Sherman

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce the absence on public business of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented memorials of Local Lodge No. 225, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Drop Forgers, and Helpers, of Topeka; of Common Laborers' Union, of Arkansas City; and of Local Lodge No. 83, Boilermakers' Union, of Kansas City, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins railroad bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Cassoday, Kans., remonstrating against the adoption of compulsory military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of O. M. Mitchell Circle, No. 20, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Osborne, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation granting increased pensions to veterans of the Civil War and to their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the First Christian Church of Lawrence, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation extending full citizenship to the American Indian, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Plymouth Congregational Church, of Lawrence, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the control and settlement of industrial disputes, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

THE RECLAMATION FUND.

Mr. MCNARY, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2822) making available additional moneys for the reclamation fund, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 335) thereon.

EMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION COMMISSION.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11223) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Employees' Compensation Commission and the Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on December 17, 1919, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 1300. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes; and

S. 2497. An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct.

WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information and consideration of the Congress a report from Bernard M. Baruch, chairman of the United States War Industries Board, of the activities of said board during the war.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 17 December, 1919.

NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.

SECOND INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of Labor making an estimate of appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of defraying the salaries and expenses of the second industrial conference called to meet in Washington December 1, 1919. I heartily approve this estimate and urgently request that the appropriation be made at the earliest possible moment.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 17 December, 1919.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. POMERENE addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Knox	Simmons
Bankhead	Gay	La Follette	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Gerry	Lenroot	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hale	McKellar	Smith, S. C.

Fernald	Keyes	Pomerene	Williams
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Wolcott
France	Kirby	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the railroad problem has been given the closest attention by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate for at least six years to my certain knowledge. In 1916 a joint committee of the Senate and House, headed by that great Senator from Nevada, Mr. Newlands, who has since gone to his reward, had extensive hearings upon the subject of railroads generally. For the last two years the Interstate Commerce Committee, being keenly alive to the tremendous importance of the railroad problem, has been studying it in all its phases. After the armistice was signed the committee took up the subject with renewed effort, and there have been almost constant hearings since that date. The railway executives were heard, the security holders, the agricultural interests, the railway management, and the representatives of labor.

Complaint has been made during the last two weeks that no opportunity was given for hearings upon this particular bill in the form it is now presented. I think, however, with all due respect, that I am within the bounds of truth when I say that there is no phase of the bill which has not been discussed to a more or less extent by every element of society interested in the subject and all of them had opportunities to be heard. I recognize the fact that there are certain men—and I say it with all due respect—who may, perhaps, have extreme views upon either side of any problem and who never can be satisfied with the attention which is given to any subject by the Congress of the United States; and, in my humble judgment, the Congress of the United States would be derelict in its duty if, after all these hearings, it did not assume the responsibility of acting, and acting now.

Mr. President, in a portion of the discussion which we have heard on the floor of the Senate it has seemed to me that it has been considered from the standpoint of certain classes of society rather than from the standpoint of the public. I recognize the great interest which capital may have in this problem, the great interest which labor may have in it, but I can not forget the interest which the public has in the subject, and my conviction is that if we attach paramount importance to the public phase of the problem we will the better serve all elements of society.

I have no apology to make for the excesses which have been committed by capital in the years gone by. I know that it has committed practically all the offenses known in the industrial and financial world; but we must not form our judgment of present responsibilities by the conduct of certain interests 20 or 30 years ago. We must, however, take counsel of the experiences of the past, but we must not be guilty of any extremes, either on the one side of this problem or the other.

Senators, again it seems to me that in the discussion of this problem, in part at least, it has been approached as if it were simply a matter that concerned certain Wall Street interests and certain labor interests, without taking into consideration the interests of the great investing and industrial public. In order that I may present the subject with some degree of accuracy I propose to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I call attention to a few figures.

In 1917 the capital stocks of the railroads outstanding amounted to $7,247,809,288; their long-term indebtedness was $9,359,048,456. The Interstate Commerce Commission is my authority for the statement that the property-investment account in that year was $14,822,227,582 in owned mileage; in leased mileage the investment was $2,939,924,545; making a total property investment of $17,762,000,000. I speak in round numbers.

Of course, this is the property investment as it appears upon the books of the railroad companies. I do not know, and no one else knows, what the actual valuation of these properties is at the present day. Suffice it to say that some six or seven years ago the Interstate Commerce Commission, by the authority of Congress, began a valuation of the properties. At the time that legislation was before the Senate I was led to believe that the valuation would be concluded within two or, perhaps, three years at the outside, but Judge Prouty is my authority for the statement that he can not even now, after five or six years of careful study of this problem, give an estimate of the total valuation of the properties which would be satisfactory to himself and that it will take several years more to complete the investigation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, do the figures which the Senator from Ohio gave of $17,000,000,000, in round numbers, include the entire railroad-property investment in the United States?

Mr. POMERENE. My memory is that figure covered only the first-class roads. I think it is accurate as to them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; that is of the roads which are known as class 1 roads.

Mr. POMERENE. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The reason I ask the question is that the testimony of Commissioner Clark was that, estimating it from various sources, he found that the total property investment, instead of being $17,000,000,000, was around $19,000,000,000 for the entire railroad properties.

Mr. POMERENE. That may be so, and I thank the Senator from South Carolina for the suggestion.

Mr. OVERMAN. As the Senator from Ohio has been interrupted, I also should like to ask him a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Ohio has the figures, I should like to know how many million dollars have been spent by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the valuation of the roads, and what they have accomplished by the expenditure of those millions of dollars.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I regret that I do not have those figures in mind at the present time; but the expenditure has been a very substantial sum.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know we have appropriated every year about $3,000,000 for such valuation, and I desire to know if the commission had succeeded in completing the work on any of the trunk lines. I heard the other day that they had completed the valuation of some roads, one of which was a short line in my State. What I desire to know, however, is what they have been doing in reference to the great trunk lines of railroad, if they have done anything at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no doubt there has been a great deal of important work done on that subject, but I do not care to go particularly into that feature of it now. I was referring to the valuation of the property rather because some criticism has been made during the debate to the effect that the valuations were now very uncertain, and that for that reason it would be next to impossible to ascertain what the earnings might be on rates which would yield 5½ per cent on the investment.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator from Ohio at that point, in order to partially answer the question of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it will be helpful along the very line that the Senator from Ohio is about to pursue.

The bureau of valuation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, of which a former commissioner, Judge Prouty, has been the head, has practically completed the inventories of the physical property of all the railroads in the United States. Many arguments have been made before the bureau of valuation with regard to questions arising during the taking of the inventories and with respect to the appraisements which are being made by those who are employed by the bureau of valuation.

It was quite evident that one of the first things that must be settled after the inventory was practically completed was the basis on which the valuation should be made; that is, the principle which should control or ought to control the Interstate Commerce Commission must first be settled. Many very interesting arguments have been made before the Interstate Commerce Commission by counsel representing the railroads of the country, not merely small roads concerning which decision has been reached but arguments covering the entire field and which will ultimately settle the entire controversy. The Interstate Commerce Commission, after those arguments had been made to it in a very extensive hearing, rendered a decision covering, I should think, 100 printed pages, which would be very interesting to anyone who wants to know what principles the Interstate Commerce Commission have adopted or probably will adopt in the valuation of the railroad properties.

Some of the controversies have found their way into the Supreme Court of the United States; and on Wednesday last, a week ago to-day, as I remember, the case that has reached the Supreme Court was argued and submitted to the court; and very soon it is expected that a decision will be announced which will guide the Interstate Commerce Commission. With those principles settled and with the inventories which have been made practically completed, it is believed that the value of all of the railroad properties can be ascertained within two or three years.

I may say, however, that with all the information now in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission it can ascertain in a broad way the value of all the properties of the country for any given purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, Mr. President, that is true; but much of this information that was gathered some five or six years ago will be of about as much value in determining a proper valuation as is a 20-year-old textbook in a lawyer's library. That, however, is not the reason why I have directed my attention to this problem.

Much capital was made of the fact that we did not have a proper valuation of the railroads now, and, therefore, it would be impossible to determine whether 5½ per cent would be a proper return upon the property of the railroads. My answer to that criticism is that, whether we adopt the pending bill or any other bill, any freight or passenger rate must be made under the Constitution with reference to the value of the property, and that responsibility will attach, as it has heretofore attached, to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the old system as well as under the new.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him again, when we come to value the railroads it will all be guesswork if it is true, as the Senator says, that the information they now have is like a 20-year-old textbook.

Mr. POMERENE. No; it will not be guesswork. It will be of some value, but it is not going to be an entirely accurate basis.

Mr. OVERMAN. It can not be accurate, and if it is like a 20-year-old textbook it will not be worth very much.

Mr. POMERENE. That was somewhat of an exaggeration. Let me say of a five or six year old textbook, which is perhaps more accurate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The work has cost $11,000,000 so far, and they appear to have gotten nowhere particularly as yet, and I do not know how long it is going to take them.

Mr. POMERENE. But, Mr. President, another feature of this question has been presented; it is treated as if all of the stocks and the bonds of the railroads were the property of Wall Street. I have to confess that I do not know how in a bill of this kind we are to discriminate between stocks and bonds held by the poor washerwoman or by some magnate in Wall Street; but in order that we may be better able to understand the public interest in this subject, I desire to present a few figures that I take from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

On December 31, 1917, the Interstate Commerce Commission tell us there were 572 class 1 roads and their nonoperating subsidiaries. At that time there were 627,930 stockholders, with aggregate holdings of 97,475,776 shares. The number of shares held by the 20 largest stockholders in each road, aggregating 8,301 persons, estates, corporations, and partnerships, was 50,873,322 shares, or a little more than one-half. In other words, 46,602,454 shares, or about one-half of the shares, were held by 619,629 men, women, and children and other holders, the average being about 75 shares. Now, it is true that in some of these roads the controlling interests are in the possession of a comparatively few men. That is not true in many of the other roads; and let me illustrate.

I have here a list of 18 roads—and I take my data from this report of the Interstate Commerce Commission—which will indicate to Senators to some degree who are interested in the holdings in many of these companies.

I beg to insert the table showing the number of stockholders and the per cent of the shares held by the 20 largest holders in each of the companies named:

road.	Total number of stockholders.	Per cent of shares held by 20 largest holders.
Pennsylvania R. R.	100,038	8.9
New York Central R. R. Co.	27,062	25.1
Baltimore & Ohio	29,360	17.4
New York, New Haven & Hartford	25,249	15.3
Pennsylvania Co.	17	100.0
Erie	9,571	19.7
Philadelphia & Reading	13	100.0
Lehigh Valley	12,325	18.1
Southern Railway	9,564	38.7
Illinois Central	10,783	41.6
Southern Pacific	37,853	23.0
Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe	44,561	14.3
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul	20,549	18.5
Chicago & North Western	12,770	20.9
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy	326	99.5
Great Northern	26,716	18.5
Northern Pacific	25,780	19.8
Union Pacific	33,875	17.8

This table shows the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. has 100,038 shareholders. The 20 largest shareholders have 8.9 per cent of the total stock, so that practically 91 per cent is in smaller holdings by the public.

The New York Central Railroad Co. has 27,062 shareholders. Twenty-five and one-tenth per cent only of the stock is held by 20 of the largest shareholders—in other words, one-fourth.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. has 29,360 shareholders. Twenty of the largest holders have only 17.4 per cent of the holdings.

On the other hand, in the case of the Pennsylvania Co., which is a holding company, as I understand, the entire capital stock is held by 17 stockholders.

In the case of the Philadelphia & Reading, 13 stockholders have 100 per cent of the holdings.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to give in detail all of these various holdings, but by permission I have incorporated them in my remarks as above.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Thus far I have spoken only of the stock. Let me now call attention to the bond holdings. I may say that the Interstate Commerce Commission does not have a complete statement of these holdings, but so far as they go I am sure they will shed some light on the subject, and I am going to give their figures as contained in this sheet.

The State banks of the country hold $1,626,298 of these bonds.

The mutual savings banks, $406,272,169.

The stock savings banks, $2,663,188.

The loan and trust companies, $33,753,533.

To obtain an approximation of the railroad bonds owned by the life insurance companies, a compilation has been made of the par value of the railroad bonds shown in the assets of the life insurance companies reporting to the superintendent of insurance of the State of New York, as shown in his report of 1918. The aggregate is $1,681,242,371. The New York Life heads the list, with $337,885,211; the Mutual Life comes next, with $304,408,457; the Equitable with $222,696,748; the Metropolitan with $210,875,682. Thus the savings banks and life insurance companies have over $2,000,000,000 of railroad bonds. A further $2,135,086,517 was held by railroad companies on December 31, 1916. The bonds actually outstanding on December 31, 1916, according to this report, amounted to $11,202,607,096.

There have been some other investigations of this subject; and while again I must add that I do not think the figures are mathematically correct, they will give to the Senate some idea of the widespread holdings. This information comes from the National Association of Owners of Railroad Securities, and it was sent to me, at my request, because I was making some investigation of this subject some time ago; and I want to read just a sentence or two from this letter:

> The most authentic figures we have been able to secure on the subject show that there are between 2,500,000 and 3,000,000 institutional and individual owners of railroad stocks.

As I understand it, they are taking into consideration those who may be financially interested in some institutions which are holders of this stock.

> There are probably some 7,500,000 institutional and individual holders of American railroad bonds.

These figures we can understand when we keep in mind the large holdings of railroad securities by the life insurance companies, the fire insurance companies, and the different savings banks of the country.

Let me go a little further into these details: It is claimed by this association that 1,000,000 individuals own about ten billions of railroad holdings. Life insurance companies having outstanding 46,000,000 policies, held, as I am advised, by about 30,000,000 policyholders, hold $1,515,000,000 of these railroad securities; fire and marine insurance companies and casualty and surety companies hold $649,000,000, while $350,000,000 of these same securities are owned by benevolent associations, charitable institutions, colleges, and schools. Trust companies and State and National banks own $685,000,000.

Now, Senators, it will occur to you that if any legislation relating to the subject of railroads is too drastic it is going to depreciate the value of these railroad securities which are held by the life insurance companies and the other savings institutions of the country as security for their policies, their stocks, and so forth; and the very minute we do anything to depreciate unduly the value of the railroad bonds or the stocks we are depreciating the value of the policies belonging to the railroad men or the other toilers of the country as security for their loved ones.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Only recently officials of a large life insurance company in my State, one of the largest, I believe, writing industrial life insurance, came to Washington anxious that this railroad legislation should be passed in order to preserve the stability of their investments, which had depreciated some 20 per cent—investments consisting of underlying first-mortgage railroad bonds amounting to $185,000,000 protecting the reserves they were carrying against the indemnity for millions of industrial workers. Their interest was to preserve the solvency of their policies protecting those industrial workers.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator. Now, let me go a step further.

During the test period recognized under the railroad-control act, the average earnings based upon the book valuations of the railroads for those three years, one of which was a bad year and the other two prosperous years, were about 5.24 per cent.

Your committee saw fit to increase this rate, as a guide for the Interstate Commerce Commission in making rates, to 5½ per cent. In the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee, Mr. Thom, who had studied this problem, gave some figures. It is true he represents the railroad companies, and to a certain extent he has the railroad viewpoint; but I think every Senator who has heard him will give him credit for at least trying to be entirely fair in the presentation of his figures. He said that in no year from 1910 to 1916 did the roads earn as much as 5.36 per cent on the book investment, and he called attention to the eastern rate case, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission said that 5.36 per cent was not adequate, in the public interest. The average of the earnings of the roads for the years 1910 to 1916 on the book investment was 4.94 per cent. Of course, we must take into consideration the fact that the book investment is in many instances above the actual valuation of the railroad properties, and, on the other hand, in some instances below the actual valuation. We can not get at this with entire mathematical accuracy.

While I am discussing the financial side of this problem, remember that when it comes to the refunding of the indebtedness of the railroads to the Government because of the advances made during Government operation, we provide that they shall take care of them by issuing mortgage securities, where that can be done, and as to a certain portion of the indebtedness which I, for want of a better term, will call floating indebtedness, we say to the railroads, "You shall pay to the Government 6 per cent interest." Is that an excessive rate under present financial conditions? And if this rate charged by the Government is not excessive, can we say that 5½ per cent return on the value of the railroad properties is too much?

More than that, it must be borne in mind that whether we are railroad employees, investors, or engaged in industrial, financial, commercial, or agricultural life we are all interested in maintaining, if we can, the stability of the railroad securities. About one-twelfth of the entire capital of the country is invested in our transportation system.

Let us remember, too, when we look at this from the standpoint of the 627,930 stockholders of the country, and from the standpoint of the bondholders themselves, that the purchasing power of the interest on the bonds or of the dividends on the stocks has been very much depreciated, just as the purchasing power of money which is earned by anyone else, whether it be as a wage or as a salary, has been.

It is said by those who have made a deep study of the railway problem that if the transportation system is to keep apace with the growth of the country there ought to be added probably $1,000,000,000 per year for several years by way of extensions and improvements. Let us cut it in two and say $500,000,000, and I am sure that is a very conservative estimate; and that must be continued for some years to come. If you unduly cut down the earnings of the company, how are you going to increase the wage of the employee? How are you going to encourage the financiers of the country, or those who may have small savings, to take these securities in order to develop the transportation system of the country as it ought to be developed?

Then bear in mind this fact, too, that at the present time railroad stocks and railroad securities are at a lower ebb than they have been for years, whereas industrial stocks are higher perhaps than they have been at any time for years. It is little encouragement to anyone to make an investment in railroad securities of any kind. Rather, at the present moment, if a man had savings to invest he would take any other kind of securities before he would take the railroad securities of the country.

Now, Mr. President, let me go a little further into this problem, to show the increase in expenditures, and I am going to submit a very few figures bearing upon that subject. I am not criticizing them as I submit them. I am addressing myself now, rather, to the expense of the operation of these roads.

The total number of employees in December, 1917, was 1,703,748. In the month of January, 1919, the total number of employees was 1,848,774, or an increase of 145,026.

The days worked in December, 1917, were 5,819,461. The days worked in January, 1919, were 6,156,896, or 237,435 more in January, 1919, than in December, 1917.

The hours worked in January, 1919, were 391,449,564. In December, 1917, they were 387,696,988, making an excess in January, 1919, over December, 1917, of 4,747,576.

The compensation paid to the employees in January, 1919, was $230,800,589; in December, 1917, it was $153,039,988, or an excess of compensation in January, 1919, over December, 1917, of $77,760,601.

The average wage per day in January, 1919, was $4.83. In December, 1917, it was $3.52, an increase per day of $1.31 between the two months.

The per hour pay in January, 1919, was $0.514; in December, 1917, it was $0.342.

Mr. President, I am not complaining about these increases in wages.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me for a moment. I think, as a rule, they were justified. I do not want them to be reduced unduly, certainly not so long as the present high cost of living continues. But I am giving these figures to show one element of the increase in the cost of the operation of these railroads as bearing upon the necessity of the Congress to deal fairly with the railroads when it comes to the matter of fixing their income, whether in gross or net. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator may follow it up, and I dislike to interrupt him right now, but I would like to know the difference between the receipts of the railroads in those years.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I intended a little later on to give some figures, but I might just as well do it now. I am not giving the gross figures; I am giving the net earnings. The other day the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]—and I quote these figures from the RECORD, page 513—said that under Government operation and control the net profit for the month of August, 1919, was $12,000,000; that for the month of September it was $19,000,000, and that for the month of October it was $11,000,000.

I do not know the source of those figures. I do know that there are different methods of calculation and that different men studying a problem and approaching it from a different standpoint may come to different conclusions.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have seen a printed circular issued by Mr. Hines showing those figures, and I went there myself to ascertain it.

Mr. POMERENE. I think I understand his figures. On yesterday I sent a letter to the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I am going to read two or three paragraphs from it so that Senators may be fully advised as to the information for which I called. I asked him for—

> A statement showing what the standard return and rental guaranteed to the railroads under the railroad-control act is, by months, for the year 1919.
> Also a statement showing the net surplus or deficit for each month of the year 1919, so far as it can be furnished, after the payment of all operating expenses, taxes, etc.
> In other words, I would like to have figures showing what the net loss or gain for each of said months to the Government is after paying all operating expenses, taxes, etc., including the payment of the said standard return.

The secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission late yesterday sent me a reply, and I think I shall read it, because it explains the figures which I shall submit later on. It reads:

> As requested in your letter of this date, I give you herewith the net railway operating income of class 1 roads for each month of 1919, in comparison with the guaranteed amount. The guaranty, of course, is an annual one, but the total amount has been distributed by months, in accordance with the monthly fluctuations in net earnings during the test period. This statement is for the large roads regularly included in our monthly reports of revenues and expenses. It will not agree precisely with the published statements issued by the director general, because of a somewhat different mileage covered by our statements, but the discrepancies are not of importance.

Now, follow the figures. If Senators will permit me, I will just give the round figures, because they will be able to follow them more closely, and I shall furnish the exact figures to the reporter later. In January, 1919, the net railway operating income was $18,700,000. Bear in mind that this sum is subject to the payment of interest and dividends. During the same month the standard return guaranteed by the Government under the railroad-control act was $55,400,000, a deficit for that month of January of $36,600,000.

In February the net railway operating income was $10,100,000, the standard return guaranteed was $46,400,000, and the deficit $36,300,000.

In March the net railway operating income was $10,800,000. The standard return guaranteed for that month was $67,800,000, a deficit of $57,000,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain why the deficit was so much larger and why the requirement was so much greater for that month than for other months?

Mr. POMERENE. During the winter months the business of the companies is always less than it is in the late summer and autumn.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator know why the standard return is so large one month and not so large another month? It seems to me rather strange that in one month it was $56,000,000, whereas the month before it was only $36,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. That may all be.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why the difference in the standard return of $20,000,000?

Mr. POMERENE. The Interstate Commerce Commission exacts monthly statements from all the railroads of the country and they are to be filed within 26 days after the month has expired. They take the net earnings, as I understand it, from each of the railroads during each of the three years of the test period and then average them and that makes the rule whereby to give the standard of compensation.

In April the net operating railway income was $26,100,000, the standard return guaranteed was $67,100,000, and the deficit $41,000,000.

In May the net railway operating income was $39,400,000, the standard return guaranteed $77,700,000, and the deficit $38,300,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems to me very strange, and I think perhaps it may occur to other Senators, that there is a difference in the standard return for different months. It looks to me as though the standard return ought to average about the same every month.

Mr. POMERENE. No; not at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not understand it.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator please, it is just as simple and just as easy to understand the figures and the variation in them as it is to understand why a banker one month will make more money than he will the next, or why a merchant will make more money in one month than he will the next.

Let me go to June——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator proceeds, permit me to observe that the Government has guaranteed a certain income for the year, but instead of dividing the year into 12 equal parts, it is here proposed to divide the year into the average profit for the particular month.

Mr. POMERENE. Not the average profit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The profit for the particular month.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator, I think, was not in the Chamber when I began my discussion of the matter. These are figures furnished to me by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They get monthly reports. The test period was for 1915, 1916, and 1917. As they take the reports for January, let us say, for each of those years they average them and this average makes up the compensation which the Government is to pay the railroads for the month of January during the period of Government control.

Let me take the month of June. The net railway operating income for the month of June was $52,200,000, the standard return guaranteed $83,400,000, the deficit $31,200,000.

In July the net railway operating income was $77,100,000, the standard return guaranteed $75,600,000, so that for the first time in any month of the year we have a surplus of $1,500,000.

In August the net operating income was $92,000,000, the standard return guaranteed $87,600,000, and again there is a surplus of $4,700,000.

In September the net railway operating income was $77,700,000, the standard return guaranteed $92,100,000, and again there is a deficit of $14,300,000.

In October the net railway operating income was $76,300,000, the standard return guaranteed $95,100,000, and again there is a deficit of $18,800,000.

So that during the 10 months the total net railway operating income was, in round numbers, $481,000,000, the standard return guaranteed for those months $748,000,000, and the deficit for the 10 months is $267,000,000.

The tabulated statement referred to and which was furnished by Hon. George B. McGinty, secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is as follows:

Net railway operating income of large roads in the United States, by months in calendar year 1919, in comparison with the standard return under the Federal-control act.

Month.	Net railway operating income, 1919.	Standard return guaranteed.	Surplus or deficit.
January	$18,783,702	$55,442,674	[2] $36,658,972
February	10,106,368	46,493,912	[2] 36,387,644
March	10,842,608	67,738,212	[2] 56,895,604
April	26,115,214	67,102,681	[2] 40,987,467
May	39,462,367	77,729,962	[2] 38,267,595
June	52,270,702	83,444,790	[2] 31,174,088
July	77,176,933	75,650,613	[3] 1,526,320
August	92,396,636	87,681,468	[3] 4,715,168
September	77,763,023	92,122,874	[2] 14,359,851
October	76,397,213	95,123,649	[2] 18,726,435
Ten months ending with October	[1] 481,082,531	748,530,835	[2] [1] 267,448,304

[1] Includes some corrections made in monthly returns as published.
[2] Deficit.
[3] Surplus.

Now, let us analyze these figures a little further. The computations which I now give were made by the clerks in my office. They are simple and correct.

Senators will remember from the figures I have given that in 8 of the 10 months there was a deficit. The total deficit for the eight months was $273,457,657. There were two months in which there was a surplus—July and August—amounting for the two months to $6,241,488. The average deficit for the eight months was $34,182,207.12, and the average surplus for the two months was $3,120,744. The net deficit for the 10 months was $267,216,169. The net deficit for each of the 10 months was $26,721,616.90. The total standard return guaranteed for the 10 months was $748,530,835, and the total standard return for 1 month on the average is $74,853,083.50.

I can understand if anyone takes the average compensation to be paid for each of the 12 months he can arrive at a different conclusion, but it seems to me if a Senator desires an accurate statement, so far as he can get it from the figures, and if he is taking the net surplus or deficit for each particular month during the current year, then those figures ought to be compared with the net earnings for each of the same months during the test period.

When it comes to a realization of the facts as they were disclosed before the Interstate Commerce Committee, we see that during the two years of Government control, according to the best judgment of the best-informed men who appeared before us, the loss to the Government during those two years is not going to be less than $650,000,000; it may reach $700,000,000, and it may be more, because, as will readily occur to Senators, we have not yet determined the question as to whether the railroad beds or the rolling stock are in as good condition now as they were before the Government assumed control. Many of those claims are unliquidated, and it is going to take time to determine what the net loss is going to be.

But when it is borne in mind that during the 10 months for which we have returns 8 of them had deficits at the end of the month and only 2 of them had meager surpluses, it seems to me there is not very much encouragement for those who plead for a further continuance of Government control.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I desire to say right in that connection—the Senator may come to it later on—that the deficits to which he has called attention under Government operation of railroads are also in conjunction with an increase in both freight and passenger rates as compared with the rates obtaining under private control during the three test years.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not catch the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I say the deficit to which the Senator has referred is immediately in the face of an increase of 25 per cent in freight and passenger rates.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. Since the Senator from South Carolina has made that suggestion—and I am obliged to him for doing so—if Senators are interested in the subject, I want to commend to their attention the testimony before our committee of Mr. Clifford Thorne. While I have seen much of Mr. Thorne, and many of his conclusions I can not accept, at the same time I think Senators who have heard him will agree with me that he is a genius when it comes to the furnishing of figures and the analyzing of data that he may have before him.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just a moment. As the Senator from South Carolina has referred to the 25 per cent increase in the freight and passenger traffic rates, as Mr. Clifford Thorne pointed out, in many instances the rates were increased very much in excess of 25 per cent. That came about by reason of the fact that the committee of rate experts with which the Director General of Railroads had surrounded himself changed the classification of the freight so that in the Middle West the increase in the rates for the shipment of coarse grains was not 25 per cent but it was from 50 to 60 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I further desire in that connection to call attention to the fact that the minimum carload rate was also an increase in many instances as high as 600 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator from South Carolina is correct.

Mr. Thorne further called our attention to the fact that in the case of many shipments from New Orleans to the other sections of the country the increase in freight rates was from 100 to 240 per cent, and the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is the authority for the statement which appears in the hearings of the committee to the effect that in Alabama and in contiguous territory many of the freight rates were increased by from 400 to 500 per cent.

Mr. KNOX. Was that due to a change of classification of freight?

Mr. POMERENE. It was by reason of the change of classification, as I understand.

I had expected to say something with regard to the Government railroad management, but I think I will pass on. It is a very interesting subject, perhaps, as a matter of history, but I think we are more interested, probably, in the pending bill.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senate to some specific provisions of the bill, and I am going to read from a memorandum I have prepared. It is not entirely complete, but it will call the attention of the Senate to some of the fundamental principles involved in the scheme which has been adopted by the committee.

First. Sections 4 and 6 of the bill provide for the division of the country into districts and of carriers into rate-making groups.

Second. Rates for transportation under this bill shall at all times be just and reasonable and sufficient to produce a reasonable return upon the aggregate value of the property in each rate-making group.

Third. And I want to call particular attention to this paragraph, because it has a bearing upon the constitutional question which has been raised. It being impracticable to establish a level of uniform rates and charges within competitive areas which will sustain sundry carriers indispensable to communities served by them without enabling more favorably situated carriers to receive revenue from such rates negligible as to each service, but in the aggregate substantially and unreasonably in excess of the aggregate over a fair return upon their property, unless regulated in the interest of the commerce of the United States as a whole, it is hereby provided that, subject to the exceptions and conditions of this act, no carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall be authorized to receive and retain for the transportation services rendered such proportion of the rates and charges collected by it as may yield in the aggregate more than a reasonable return upon its property investment.

Fourth. The railway carriers as a whole allocated to each district shall earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal, as nearly as may be, to 5½ per cent upon the aggregate value.

Of course, I know that Senators have all given attention enough to this subject in order to realize that the rates on the several carrier lines must be the same. If lower rates are fixed for a prosperous road because it does not need the net earnings which it might get by a given rate than are fixed on a less prosperous line, the result will be that all competitive business will go from the less prosperous line to the more prosperous line. So the rates must be the same in the several districts which are to be defined.

Fifth. Reasonable latitude is given to the commission in order to adjust any particular rate, fare, or charge which may be found unreasonably high or unreasonably low.

Sixth. The commission, in its discretion, may add to the above one-half of 1 per cent upon the aggregate value of such property to make provision, in whole or in part, as the case may be, for what are commonly known as nonproductive improvements, betterments, or equipments, but this amount shall not be capitalized or used in any way as a basis for increased rates, fares, or charges by those carriers whose net operating income for the year exceeds 5½ per cent upon the value of their respective properties.

Seventh. For rate-making purposes, the commission shall from time to time determine the value of the property in each district and rate-making group, and lower or advance the rates, fares, or charges as the facts may justify.

Eighth. If any carrier shall receive a net railway operating income in any one year of more than 6 per cent—bear in mind that this relates to the individual carriers—from the 5½ per cent rate rule which is prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, after allowance by the commission for nonproductive improvements, one-half of such excess between 6 and 7 per cent shall go to a reserve fund established by such carrier and the remaining one-half of such excess shall be paid to the transportation board for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a general railroad contingent fund.

Ninth. Out of any excess above 7 per cent, one-fourth shall be placed in the reserve fund of the carrier and the remaining three-fourths shall be paid over to the board for the general railroad contingent fund.

Tenth. The carrier may draw upon its reserve fund whenever and to the extent that its net annual operating income shall fall below 6 per cent of the value of its property.

Eleventh. When this reserve fund exceeds 6 per cent of the value of its property, two-thirds of such excess shall be turned over to the transportation board as a part of the general contingent fund and the remaining one-third shall be retained by the carrier for such lawful use or disposition as may be determined.

Twelfth. The general railroad contingent fund and the accretions thereof must be invested or expended by the board in furtherance of the public interest in railway transportation by the carriers in avoiding congestions, interruptions, or hindrances to the railway service of the United States, or in furthering the public service rendered by them, either by purchase, lease, or rental of transportation equipment and facilities to be used by such carriers wherever the public interest may require, or by way of lease of such carriers upon such fair and reasonable terms and conditions as the board may prescribe.

Thirteenth. In the year 1925, and every fifth year thereafter, the commission shall determine, under then existing conditions, what constitutes a fair return upon the value of the railway property, and it may increase or decrease the 5½ per cent hereinbefore prescribed, or the basis of the determination of the excess income.

I recognize there may be an honest difference of opinion as to just what limit should be placed upon the rule of rate making to be followed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; I realize how there can be an honest difference of opinion as to what disposition shall be made of the so-called excess earnings. I recognize, however, at the same time that we are all interested in reasonable rates, and that these being public-service corporations necessarily their net earnings must be limited. I realize also at the same time that we must be so reasonably liberal with all the railroads that the less prosperous of them shall continue to function for the good of their respective communities.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just at that point I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question for information. The Senator is a member of the committee which framed the bill and which had it under consideration for a considerable length of time, aggregating several months. The bill has come into the Senate, and a good many of us are now giving consideration to the bill for the first time, because it is the only opportunity we have had so to do. I should like to know how the plan which is proposed here would benefit the less prosperous roads.

Mr. POMERENE. The question is a very proper one.

If we were to fix a rate which would yield a sufficient return to, let us say, the most prosperous road or the average road, the public might say, "It is sufficient for that road"; but if we had in mind only the average road the rate would not be sufficient to sustain the less prosperous roads; so that in any scheme that we may adopt, whether it is the one provided for in this bill or any other, we must have in mind the less prosperous roads.

Let us assume there are six roads in a given district. Two of them are not at all prosperous, two of them are average roads, two of them are very prosperous roads. But, now, if we make the rate so as to yield a sufficient return on the very prosperous roads or the average roads it will not be sufficient to sustain the less prosperous roads. We therefore provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the transportation board shall take the valuation of all of these roads and make a rate which will give a return of 5½ per cent on the total valuation of all of the roads. Now, it will occur to Senators that when we bring in the valuation of these less prosperous roads, and they figure in the making of the rate, it will increase the rate for the entire district over and above what it would be if the rate were made for the other two classes, so that they will get the benefit of that increased rate in the general scheme.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just at that point it occurred to me that the effect of that plan might be very slight indeed, so far as the less prosperous road is concerned, but would add to the net earnings or business of the more prosperous road, because in many cases the cause for one road being less prosperous may be the lack of quantity of commodities to move and the increase of rate would not increase the commodities, so far as that road is concerned; but by increasing the rate over the whole district you would be adding to the earnings of the more prosperous roads in a very material way.

Mr. POMERENE. There is a good deal of force in what the Senator says, but I do not know how you are going to fix it except to provide for the same rate in a given district. I think the more the Senator studies that problem the more he will find that this will yield some advantage to the less prosperous roads, and that so far as the more prosperous are concerned we take from them their excess earnings. If we were to prescribe a rate which would keep the prosperous roads within certain ironclad limits, of course we could do away with the excess earnings; but if we did that, what would become of the less prosperous roads? This is a matter that has not only given the Senator from New Mexico a great deal of concern but it has given a vast deal of concern to every member of the committee.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I not ask if this is not about the most simple form of statement: In order to meet the constitutional question that was raised, and which superficially gives anybody pause, you are going on the theory that the Government has the power, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, to deal with this transportation question as a whole, and that you are purposely allowing the prosperous roads to collect a greater rate than they otherwise would if they were standing upon their own individual footing, in order that the surplus they make may take care of the less prosperous roads.

Is not that about the simplest form of statement?

Mr. POMERENE. I would not express it quite in that way.

Mr. KNOX. No; I would not if I were standing in the Senator's place as a member of the committee, explaining this bill; but I am just telling the Senator how it strikes my mind, that that is substantially the situation.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator would qualify his statement by saying that we fix the rate in such a way as to give advantage to the less prosperous roads, then I agree with him; but we do not have in mind the surplus for the purpose of giving direct benefit to the less prosperous roads. We do benefit them, however, under the scheme of the bill, by saying that a certain portion of this excess—the larger part of it, in fact, one-half of the first 1 per cent above 6, and three-quarters of the balance—shall go into a railroad contingent fund out of which the Government can make loans to the less prosperous roads or to purchase equipment to be leased or loaned to any road that may require it.

Mr. KNOX. It does not seem to me to make any difference which way you state it. The fact nevertheless is—and the very fact that you provide for this contingent fund for the purpose of taking care of the less prosperous roads indicates—that the more prosperous roads are going to collect more money than they are entitled to hold.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; that is what they are doing now; and I am obliged to the Senator, because he has illumined the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as one member of the committee is concerned, I am willing absolutely to accept the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. That is just what we are trying to do.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will pardon me there, my only exception to the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania was that this surplus was not for the direct benefit of these less prosperous roads.

Mr. KNOX. I think we are substantially in accord.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, indeed, we are.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true. I meant to agree with the Senator from Ohio just as fully as I did with the Senator from Pennsylvania; but for the benefit of those who may not know the origin of this idea I want to say just a word, if it will not interfere with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. A few years ago the Interstate Commerce Commission had before it what is known as, first, the 5 per cent rate advance case and afterwards the 15 per cent rate advance case. A hearing extending over months and months was conducted, and the Interstate Commerce Commission went into the question with the greatest fullness and care. The hearing to which I now refer related to the railroads in the eastern district.

What was the result? It found that one railroad was earning all that it ought to earn and more. It found that another railroad was earning less than it ought to earn and could not maintain itself upon rates which necessarily were uniform, had to be uniform; I mean competitive rates, upon which a large part of the traffic is always carried. Now, in that dilemma, what did the Interstate Commerce Commission do? It selected what it was pleased to call—and I am not criticizing its terminology—typical railroads, and it averaged those railroads, ascertained the average of their earnings, and, of course, their necessities, and it attempted to put upon the eastern district a body of rates that would not do quite justice to the weaker roads, that did a little more than justice to the stronger roads, but, on the whole, constituted a fair average of the situation.

In a formal but in a much more effective way that is precisely what we are trying to do in this bill. We are trying to make the best arrangement possible to sustain all the roads without giving any undue or excessive earnings to any of the roads.

Mr. POMERENE. And if I may add a word at that point, I want to say to those Senators who are opposing this bill because it provides for an excess earning, that if they are going to continue with the law as it now is, there will be in that respect more of complaint against the present law than there is against the pending measure. It must be borne in mind that if that man is born who can write a bill which is going to give even and exact justice to everybody, I have not come in contact with him.

Mr. THOMAS. He is not in public life.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, I do not think he is.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just a further word on the subject we were discussing a moment ago, to get a little more concrete information: The road which is not prosperous is getting less return, of course, on the actual value of its property than the prosperous road; and when you go to increase a rate based upon the valuation of all the roads in the system, then the value of the nonprosperous roads becomes an added asset to the district and becomes a factor in the fixing of rates for the entire district; and, by reason of the favored location or other conditions surrounding the prosperous railroad, does not the value of the nonprosperous road add to these assets in such a way that that value will become a factor in increasing the rate of the district, to the advantage of the prosperous road, while it will not add materially to the actual income of the nonprosperous road?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I should say not. If you add to the value of any of these roads, of course it increases the total valuation, and you would still have the same 5½ per cent on the total valuation which they would be permitted to earn.

But now I want to call the Senate's attention to another feature. Senators will remember that the commerce act provides that rates of traffic shall be just and reasonable. That is the only provision in the present law affecting rates, as I recall it. Of course, there is a contention on the part of some that this rate has relation only to the cargo which is to be transmitted and it does not relate, directly or indirectly, to the return which the company is entitled to have. I do not agree with that construction. It seems to me that when you fix a rate, any tribunal must bear in mind that the railroad company itself is entitled to a reasonable return on the business or on its capital invested.

But the whole proposition was left so indefinite in the old law that your committee thought that we should lay down a certain formula which should be borne in mind in fixing these rates. So we have provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in changing or modifying rates, fares, charges, and classifications, is required to take into consideration, (a) the interest of the public; (b) the shippers; (c) the wages of labor; (d) the interest, maintenance, and operation, including taxes; and (e) the requirements for additional capital in order to enable the carriers to adequately perform their duties to the public, and the conditions under which the same shall be secured. I do not think anybody can raise any fair objection to those provisions.

In any enterprise the individual, or firm, or corporation, if it is going to do business, not only must buy labor and buy material but it is compelled to buy money, and when you bear in mind that at the present time there are bonds outstanding of $10,000,000,000 or $11,000,000,000, which are maturing at the annual rate of probably $140,000,000 or $150,000,000, and these bonds must be refunded, the old ones retired, many of which were issued at a low rate of interest, when the prevailing rates of money had advanced, why should we not take that fact into consideration? If you do not, how are you going to finance the railroads?

The man or the woman who invests money in railroad securities is entitled to a reasonable return. I have no defense to make of those people who in the past have wrecked roads or issued watered stock and bonds. I know of no words in the English language which are too strong to be used in condemnation of that practice. But that is past history. We are confronted by the now, the present, the future; and what are you going to do? If you are going to pare down the earning capacity of these roads so that the more prosperous of them can perhaps make only a modest return, what is going to happen to the others? We can not judge of one road or of one locality by another. The problem is nation-wide, and it must be dealt with from the standpoint of the Nation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Just a moment. Further, we sold a lot of Government bonds in order to finance the Great War, and the first two billion we sold at 3½ per cent, exempt from all taxation. Others were sold at 4, 4¼, and 4½. The last issue, which was sold just last March and April, we sold at 4¼, exempt from practically all taxation except the supertax.

We sold during the Victory-loan campaign less than seven billions of dollars of bonds, drawing 4¾ per cent, tax free except supertaxes. But we only sold them because we had back of that campaign all the patriotism and all the enthusiasm of every man, woman, and child in the country. If we are to refund these bonds at present rates we have to remember the state of the money market as well. We might for a time use the Bolshevik methods of operating the printing press, but it would not be very long before we would scrap not only the railroads but the credit of the country as well. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to get a little clearer, if I could, the manner in which nonprosperous roads are to be benefited by this legislation, if at all. As I take it, any increase of rates would not affect the nonprosperous roads in any way that would not affect the prosperous roads.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. On the contrary, the probabilities are that the prosperous roads would get a much greater benefit from an increase of rates than the nonprosperous roads. The result is a contingent fund. Now, I should like to ask the Senator how that contingent fund is to be used for the benefit of the nonprosperous roads. The Senator has spoken of furnishing money for the purchase of cars as one element. I take it that money will be furnished at interest, and will there be any special favoritism in that regard? Is there any provision in the bill which would authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to loan the money at less than the prevailing rates, or in what way will the nonprosperous roads secure any special advantage?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, those details are rather details of administration, I take it, than of legislation. They would, of course, be benefited whatever the rate, if reasonable. If the condition became such that they needed additional equipment the transportation board out of this contingent fund could buy it and lease it. Though there is no special provision in the bill, I assume, of course, that they would take counsel of financial conditions as they then were. I do not know that they would be controlled by them. That is a matter of detail that is not worked out in the bill, and I do not see readily how it could be. We must, of course, intrust some of these matters to the administrative branch of the Government, including the transportation board which is provided for under the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That was precisely the point which I wished to bring out, so that it might clearly appear that this contingent fund, so far as the bill goes, is to be handled by the transportation board. There is no restriction in the bill as to how that board may use it, and it might use it by way of donations.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I do not think so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Or lease cars to the nonprosperous roads at a nominal rental.

Mr. POMERENE. I can not now locate that provision in the bill, but I take it that they would use this contingent fund, having due regard to the security of the Government, very much after the fashion in which the Director General of Railroads has been using the revolving fund of five hundred millions which we originally gave to him, and which has been added to from time to time since.

Mr. President, we have provided for a transportation board of five members to be selected by the President and to be confirmed by the United States Senate. The board of five is to continue until after the consolidation of the roads in the manner provided for, and then its membership is to be reduced to three. That was the judgment of the committee. It was felt at that time, perhaps after the consolidation work was completed, that their duties would be reduced to a minimum and it would not be necessary to have the five. I do not know whether the judgment of the committee was accurate in that behalf or not. It seems to me, the more I study the problem, that while their duties may be diminished in the one direction they may be accumulating in other directions.

About a year ago I introduced in the Senate a bill providing amendments to the commerce act, and the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Interstate Commerce introduced the same bill in the House. At that time it was believed that instead of devising an entirely new scheme for the operation and control of the railroads it would perhaps be best to content ourselves with a modification of the old law in respects which were deemed wise after taking counsel of Government operation.

We provided in the bill for Government control of the issuance of all railroad securities, for the greater consolidation of the railroads, for the common use of terminals, for the fixing of minimum and maximum rates instead of maximum rates only, as the law now provides, and for the larger control of traffic, sometimes loosely described as the pooling of traffic, and for greater control over the car service. I think that all of these changes were prompted by the experience we have had during the last 15 or 20 years and particularly because of the development due to national necessities during the period of the war.

But the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate in its investigation of the subject felt that the Government should have a greater control over the administration of the railroads than heretofore; that we ought to operate them in consolidated systems, but always under the Government's eye. To that end we felt that while the subject was up we ought to take hold of it in its broader aspects, and that we have done.

We also felt that, due to the exigencies of the war, the changes in freight rates which have already been made, and the changes which will be necessitated hereafter, we were going to increase very materially the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the subject of rates, charges, and classifications. So we felt that it would be better to divorce from the Interstate Commerce Commission, for whose work I have the profoundest admiration, taking it as a whole, many of the administrative duties and turn them over to the transportation board. We have provided for the rate-making groups and a plan for the consolidation of the railroads in not less than 20 nor more than 35 districts.

We have provided that the roads may be consolidated under plans which are to be devised by the transportation board and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and that the consolidations shall be voluntary for a period of seven years, because we believe that if the large number of roads, particularly the so-called feeders, can be consolidated with the trunk lines, we can not only reduce the overhead charges but we can improve the character of the service to be rendered by the lines in the combined state. But bear in mind that anything which can be done in this behalf must be done under the supervision of the transportation board and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We provide further that if after seven years the lines shall not have been consolidated, then the transportation board and the Interstate Commerce Commission can compel the consolidation prescribed in the bill.

Of course, I recognize the fact that serious objection is raised to the compulsory feature, but my belief is that under the plan adopted most of the roads will combine. It may or may not be found wise at the end of seven years to consolidate the other roads, if any, which have not consolidated voluntarily, but the fact that the provision is there will aid in stimulating the desire of the roads to get together. I think that any student of the subject will come to the conclusion that after we shall have consolidated them we will be helping to solve the rate-making problem and to a certain extent we will be doing away with the difficulty which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] had in mind when he was speaking of the less-prosperous roads. I feel confident that is true.

ISSUE OF SECURITIES.

I come now to the issuance of securities. I am not going to take up all the features of the bill, because I have already occupied more time than I had intended. Anyone who has studied the history of the railroads during the last 25 or 30 or 40 years realizes that the issuance of watered stock, and perhaps watered bonds, has led to untold difficulties. But under the pending bill I assert without fear of successful contradiction that it will be absolutely impossible for any company to issue watered stock or watered bonds, and I commend its provisions in that respect to the considerate attention of Senators.

Why should the Federal Government do this? I recognize the fact that some of the State utilities commissions are very jealous of their authority to control the financing of the railroads in their several States, but it has been a serious handicap not only to the railroads themselves but to the public. Let me illustrate:

Under the laws of most of the States application must be made for authority to issue stocks or bonds, as the case may be. Certain formalities must be complied with. There are rises and falls in the financial market. To-day perhaps you could negotiate a loan at 4½ or 5 per cent. Next month or the month following probably the rates for money have advanced and it would be utterly impossible to get the money at any rate whatever. It appeared before our committee in the discussion of this subject that one system of road—I have forgotten which it was, but it was one of the great western trunk lines—had to make its application to the public utilities commissions of 14 different States before they could complete their loan. It turns out also that some of the commissions, in order to get advantage for their particular States, will say, "We will not approve the application unless you will spend a certain sum on your road in this particular State," and the sum that they demanded to be spent might be in excess of the requirements of the road or the transportation there. It may be that by the time they got the consent—as I understand it happened in this particular case, where application had to be made to 14 different commissions—it was impossible to make the loan at the rate determined upon when the loan was finally approved.

But more than that, it must be borne in mind that the greater the uniformity of rules which are prescribed for the issuance of stocks and bonds the more likely the roads will be able to sell their stocks and bonds.

Further than that, I want to commend this fact to Senators: It is said that about 85 per cent of the traffic of the country is interstate and about 15 per cent is intrastate. If 85 per cent is interstate, why has not the Federal Government a greater right to control the financing of the roads than to have them subject to the jurisdiction of the commissions of every State through which the lines of the carrier may pass? Also, in order that the board may be fully advised, it is provided that when it comes to the issuance of any securities notice shall be served upon the governor of the State through which any of the carriers' lines may pass, so that the State authorities may have the opportunity to be heard, and the board will have before it the situation as it is seen by the eyes of the public officials of the several States. I think in that way we can aid very materially the financing of the roads.

Mr. President, there is another thought that I want to leave with Senators.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator begins the discussion of a new subject, may I interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Section 13 of the bill troubles me. It was claimed by the chairman of the committee, in reply to a question which I asked him, that under the provisions of section 13 of the bill the Government can force a consolidation of a State railroad with a privately owned road.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean by that a State-owned road?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; or a railroad one-half or three-fourths of which is owned by the State. I asked the chairman how that could be done, and he replied by condemnation. I doubt the power of the Government to condemn State property. The State can not condemn Government property. How can the Federal Government condemn a part of the sovereignty of a State? When the State charters a railroad and owns it, it is a part of its sovereignty. Can the Government condemn State property?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has suggested a very interesting subject. The Senator, I think, does not speak accurately, however, when he speaks of condemning the sovereignty of a State. If it is anything, it is condemning the property of a State.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is both; it is the property of the State and its sovereignty, because the title to the property is in the State and, therefore, it is a part of the sovereignty of the State.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think that is an accurate statement; but I desire the Senator to bear this in mind——

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose we limit it to property and leave out the question of the State's sovereignty. Does the Senator think the General Government can condemn such property?

Mr. POMERENE. My judgment about the matter can be given in a word. The power to compel consolidation is not a mandatory power which is conferred upon the board; it is a permissive authority. Of course, I do not have in mind the road to which the Senator may refer, and perhaps it is not a question which would address itself especially to the Senate; it might be a question which would be of very much more interest in the administration of the act; but, in a word, from a legal standpoint—and the Senator's question, I take it, was addressed to me rather in that behalf than any other——

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I know the Senator is a constitutional lawyer.

Mr. POMERENE. Under the Constitution the United States Government has the power to establish post roads; it has the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. The power to regulate is very comprehensive, and I think it true that in the exercise of that power it would have the right to say to any State, "It is the judgment of the Federal Government that a certain road should be taken over by the Federal Government to serve the Federal purpose"; and I do not think it would lie within the power of a State under those circumstances to say "nay." I have in mind one particular road——

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator gets to that, continuing the discussion of the constitutional question, if the Government has that authority, it is under the power of eminent domain.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Therefore, if the Government has the power—wherever it may lead—under the right of eminent domain, either for the purposes of interstate commerce or to establish post offices and post roads, or for any other purpose, to condemn the property of a State, it would have the right to condemn all of the property of a State, would it not?

Mr. POMERENE. That is a different proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Government has a right to condemn a part of the property of the State, it could condemn it all.

Mr. POMERENE. It would have a right to condemn property for certain purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it could do so for any purpose—and it is not supposable that a case of that kind would occur—but if the Government had the authority under the power of eminent domain to condemn a part of the property of the State, it would have a right to condemn all of the property of the State, and, therefore, could wipe the State out of existence.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator has answered his objection when he says that that is a very improbable situation. I can understand how the question might arise. I do not know the situation to which the Senator refers, but I can understand how a State might seriously object to the condemnation of a property within its borders. That, however, would be a matter that would be taken up, I dare say, by the transportation board and considered and determined. I do not think there will be any arbitrary exercise of power or anything of that kind. My notion is that after three, or four, or five, or six, or seven years most companies will have consolidated. Then those who are interested will come to the conclusion that is the best scheme to be applied to the railroads and the problem will be practically solved. There may be a few instances in which it may not be thought wise to consolidate.

The junior Senator from Louisiana the other day presented an amendment to take care of certain belt lines or other lines owned by the city of New Orleans. That is a matter in which the city of New Orleans has a material interest, but it is a local interest; we are not concerned in that. I think it would be very unwise to attempt to take over that property. At the same time my belief is that if the Federal Government in its wisdom felt that it should do so it would have the power. The Senator has raised a very interesting question.

TAXATION AND POLICE POWER.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted by the Senator from North Carolina I intended simply to refer to the power of the States over the subject of taxation and to the police power of the States. Those powers are fully reserved, as they ought to be, to the several States and the political divisions thereof. It is not attempted to disturb them in the least, and we ought not to do so. The railroad properties are proper subjects for State and local taxation; they are located within the several States and the several communities thereof, and the States and divisions thereof should continue to exercise the police power and the power of taxation as heretofore.

Mr. President, there is another part of the bill which I desire to discuss briefly. I have expressed my views heretofore upon this subject and I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I develop them a little further. I realize that this is a very delicate question. I refer to the so-called strike provisions of the bill. I realize the sentiment that is back of it all; I realize that labor has had many contests in the past; I realize fully that the employer class in many instances has been very unjust toward the employee class. My sympathies have always been and now are with the laboring class, and I always deem myself very happy when I can find myself in accord with their views and their demands. I think my record in the Senate during the eight years I have been here has shown not a casual interest in what they wanted, but a very intense interest in what they wanted, and so long as I live, whether in public life or in private life, I expect to continue that interest. But there are certain times when under certain leadership certain things have been done in the name of labor which have not been of any benefit to labor.

And while we are discussing the rights of employer and employee, let us always keep before our minds the rights of the vast public, 110,000,000 people, among whom are the so-called employers and employees, transportation men, manufacturing men, miners, farmers, all the people of the country. In my humble judgment there never was a time in the history of this country and there never will be a time when it will be more important that every individual and every class of its citizens should consider themselves subordinate to the public and the public good.

I do not believe there is a situation in this country that justifies, even if we had the power, the prohibition of strikes in industrial life—I mean by that in manufacturing, mining, commerce—because, if for no other reason, when those questions arise they are local in their interest; but when it comes to the great agency of interstate commerce, it seems to me that we can differentiate.

I want to call the Senate's attention, as I approach this matter, to the enormity of the problem.

There are 260,000 miles of railway in the country. They are valued at probably from seventeen to twenty billions of dollars. They are the arteries of commerce. Stop transportation and you stop the delivery of the food products from the country to the cities; you stop the delivery of coal from the coal fields to the consumer; you stop the delivery of the raw material to the factory; you stop the delivery of the finished product to the consumer. The value of the manufactured products in this country in 1914 was $24,246,434,724. Taking into consideration increased values, it is probably at least 50 per cent more than these figures indicate.

The mineral products of 1918 were valued at $5,526,162,000. The farm products for 1918 were valued at $21,386,000,000. Our foreign trade, exports and imports, for the calendar year 1918 amounted to $9,180,300,255, and during the present year they will amount to considerably more.

For the last six months our people have been disturbed by the unrest throughout the country. We have had longshoremen's strikes, coal strikes, steel strikes, threatened railroad strikes at the time when we were demobilizing an army of 4,000,000 men, 2,000,000 of whom had done service for their country and for humanity across the seas; and as these vast armies were being demobilized and were melting away into the civil life of the country these disturbances have come up. In some of them no doubt the complaints are justified, and so far as they are justified I want them to get their just deserts, and at all times I do not want labor to be treated merely fairly; I want labor to be treated liberally.

I recognize the patriotism of most of the men that belong to the laboring class. I recognize the patriotism of all classes, generally speaking. No one class has a monopoly of it, and no one class has a monopoly of law-abiding citizens. But what would be the effect if there were a strike on the railroads which interfered with the traffic of a substantial part of the community?

Take the great centers of population—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco. Within five days' time, if there were a general strike in any one of these localities, the entire population therein would be brought to the brink of starvation. It might be that in every other avenue of employment employer and employee would be entirely satisfied, getting good wages, prosperous, happy, as they ought to be, and as I hope they always will be; and I shall be glad to lend a helping hand whenever I can to improve the conditions of the laboring classes. But all of these men thus engaged in other lines of industry could be thrown out of work by a strike by a substantial number of the men in any one branch of the railway service.

We have had a number of hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee bearing upon the subject of the relations of employees to employers in the transportation field. I recall labor leaders testifying very frankly, very openly, very candidly, concerning the disputes they have had across the conference tables, and I remember one of the grand chiefs saying that he had seen the time when he would have been most happy to follow some of the men on the other side of the table to their graves.

It was said laughingly. I have no doubt that men on both sides of the table felt the same way. I am not finding fault with them. Such feelings evidence the human nature of the participants. I do not wonder that men of intensity of purpose and of great ability have differences, but I have referred to it for this purpose: When men are in that frame of mind, ought the entire transportation of the country to be at their mercy? That is the problem. We can face it or shun it as we choose, but that is the problem now before the American people.

And, I want to say, so far as concerns the demands for wages by most of these laboring men in the transportation service, I think they were, for the most part, justified. Some of them have not been. It was because I felt in 1916 that their demands for better hours and consequent better wages were justified, in part, that I voted in favor of the Adamson law, and under the same conditions I would cast the same vote again. But with all of these strikes, actual and threatened, what ought we to do? Must the Congress, representing 110,000,000 people, say, "We are powerless to act"? Because certain propagandists come before Congress and demand certain changes in our economic policies, must Congress sit silently by when men talk of revolution?

It is true that when the expressions were used on one day, and certain gentlemen who used them saw that they were not being received with complacency by the public, they said that all they intended was social revolution. I think that is what some of them did intend, but some of them intended more; and let me say that the public generally understands what is meant when men talk of revolution. There never has been and never will be any occasion under the American form of government to talk of revolution. Some say that it is an inherent right with which man is endowed. I understand, of course, that there are times under certain political conditions when revolution is justified, and I would not be true to my American faith if I did not say that George Washington and his confrères were justified in revolution. But when our forefathers adopted the Constitution they were wise enough to provide for its amendment or change in the orderly and peaceful manner therein prescribed. Similar provisions are found in the constitution of each of the States. I would not take that right away from the people of this country or from the people of any State. But it must be done in conformity with the law of the land.

[At this point Mr. THOMAS raised the question that there was no quorum present, and the roll was called.]

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is another feature of this subject to which I wish to refer for just a moment. I have always the greatest respect for differences of opinion, and I think I can make proper allowances for intensity of purpose; but some witnesses have come before our committee and have said, as will be borne out by an examination of the record as well as by the public prints, that if this legislation looking to the adjustment of industrial difficulties should pass the law would not be complied with and that it would be defied. Without commenting especially upon this class of testimony, I want to direct this question to every man, woman, and child in the United States: Has any man the right to say he will defy the law of his country? Do law-abiding citizens so demean themselves?

If a law is placed upon the statute books which is not in conformity with the wishes of the public, or if the public has changed its mind and wants a change, there is an orderly way under the Constitution to bring about its repeal. That is the only method to which any American has a right to resort. I make that statement as applying to any man, whether he is of the employer class or the employee class. There is not any room for difference of opinion, Senators, upon that question. I know of only one autocrat in this country that will be tolerated, and that is the supreme majesty of the law. Autocrats, whether of one class or another, will not be tolerated by the public. The seat of government is, and always will be, under the dome of this Capitol, and it will not be under the hat of any man, whether he be capitalist, labor leader, or anyone else.

Mr. President, what are the provisions of this bill with respect to the settlement of strikes, so far as they relate to transportation? We do not say, "Your labor difficulties must be adjusted by some governmental board." In substance, this is the theory of the bill: We think that all disputes should be settled, and, in substance, we say, "We have schemes of mediation, conciliation, and arbitration. Use any of those methods that you choose to settle your differences, or adopt any other scheme that you want to settle your troubles. We hope you will settle them." But we say, "If you can not settle them, we feel that the cause of law and order, the cause of humanity itself, requires that you should present your difficulties to an impartial tribunal for hearing and determination, and after they shall have been heard and determined that both bodies shall comply with the decision." Is there anything wrong about this?

I have a difference, it may be, with one of the Senators over a matter which is near to my heart. I can not be permitted to take the law in my own hands; I ought not to be permitted to do it. Tribunals have been established whereby all disputes which may exist between us shall be determined. Now, let us apply this same principle to transportation.

Most of the disputes arise over questions of wages or hours or working conditions. Most of them are settled. We say all of them ought to be settled. Has any man the right to say that because I have a dispute with a transportation company I have the unconditional right to stop every line of transportation entering into a center of population? As the winter approaches, shall I have the right to stop the transportation of coal? Knowing that the country is filled with food products, shall I have the right to say that they shall not move in interstate commerce until my demands are granted? The babes of the country need their milk, yet shall I stand here and say the babes shall starve unless my demands are granted?

When leaders of labor or capital work themselves into such a state of mind that they can say, "I have seen the day when I would like to attend the funeral of the man on the other side of the table," must the country submit to that domination? And shall Congress say nothing on the subject?

Senators, you know how strikes are often brought about, and so do I. Let us be candid with the public. Strikes sometimes are not brought on by the men themselves, but by their leaders, by their delegates, as in the coal strike. The miners in the recent strike were not given an opportunity to speak for themselves. Their delegates and officers called the strike. Do not forget that sometimes strikes are brought on and are carried out when they are not even approved by many of the strikers.

What has your committee tried to do? We say to the men, "If you can not adjust your differences by reason of any method now known or which you may hereafter devise, here is a tribunal known as the committee on wages and working conditions, composed of eight men, who are selected by a transportation board of five men, who in turn are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the United States Senate." The transportation board will name four men who are representative of the different railroad crafts and who are selected by nominations made by the craftsmen themselves. The other four men are selected from the nominations made by the railroads of the country. Certainly both classes would nominate their best men, or the men whom they thought would stand by their interests and at least be just.

Then we say that if, by a majority vote, they agree to a settlement of the matter in dispute, it shall be subject to the approval of the transportation board, which represents the public, and if they are evenly divided then the transportation board shall settle it. Is there anything wrong about that?

It seems to me that when we are legislating, recognizing the fact that the legislation may not be entirely acceptable to everybody concerned, our duty requires that we do that which is going to be in the interest of the public, and, with all due respect, my guess is that if this plan is adopted and tried, the laboring men of the country would not go back to the old system, experts to the contrary notwithstanding.

Again, when it comes to disputes other than those relating to wages and working conditions, we have three adjustment boards. They must hear and determine disputes. An appeal lies from these boards to the committee on wages and working conditions. Without going into the details of the bill, the adjustment boards are selected in the same way as is the committee on wages and working conditions.

Then we say to the railroads and to their officers and attorneys and agents, "When the boards have entered their decrees you shall carry them out; and if not, you are subject to the penalties prescribed in the law." Is there anything unreasonable about that? Let us be fair with one another.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. POMERENE. Just for a question.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator says that they will be subject to the penalties of the law if they do not abide by the decree. The Senator does not mean that the individual worker will be subject to the penalties of any law?

Mr. POMERENE. I am talking now about the officers, agents, and attorneys of the companies, and I am going to address myself to the others in just a moment. The officers of the railroad companies are required to comply with the decisions of these several boards.

Then we say with regard to all classes that if two or more persons enter into a combination or agreement with the intent to substantially hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or in pursuance of such agreement or combination to substantially hinder, delay, or restrain the operation of trains, then they shall be subject to the penalties; but always the right is given, the unqualified right of the individual, to quit his employment whenever he chooses.

Much is said about collective bargaining. I believe in collective bargaining. I always have believed in it. I can not see how I could change my mind on that subject. But in order to have a complete statement of the proposition there must be a corollary added to the right of collective bargaining, and that corollary is this: In the name of humanity collective bargaining does not mean collective dictation whether by one class or another. If Senators are of the opinion that even among the laboring classes themselves there is but one side to the problem, I say with all due deference they are mistaken. One of the men—of course, for obvious reasons I shall not name him—came to my office a few days ago interested in behalf of one of the organizations, and said to me, "Formerly I felt it was wrong to attempt in any way to restrict the right to strike, but my careful study of the subject leads me to commend the Interstate Commerce Committee for incorporating these strike provisions in the bill."

Mr. President, much has been said about involuntary servitude. I do not believe in involuntary servitude; I never did; but everything that is called involuntary servitude is not involuntary servitude simply because it is so called. Under our scheme of government the majority rules; the majority will rule. There is not a day that we do not make concessions the one to the other because of the necessities of society. It is right that it should be so; it always will be so. What class of men can say, "We must have the unrestrained right to stop the commerce of the country"? I want to call before them the sight of the innocent men, women, and children of the country when hunger begins to pinch them because of the lack of food, and the cold begins to freeze them because of the lack of fuel. Senators, it ought not to be necessary to invoke the aid of the courts to prevent such conditions. The only thing that ought to be necessary to control should be the appeals from the sufferers themselves. Involuntary servitude! Suppose that I were to say to 400 men, "Drop your picks at 6 o'clock to-night." What is that? "Take them up to-morrow." What is that? "Obey my orders, not the Government's; think only of yourselves, not of the 110,000,000 people." What is that? "Listen to a strike leader. Pay no attention to the appeals of the President of the Republic."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, upon the point he is now discussing, I should like to refer to an opinion of Justice Harlan which was cited by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in the course of his debate, and from which he drew the conclusion that what we seek to do in this bill was condemned by that opinion.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may not get an opportunity to discuss the matter further, and I am sure the Senator from Ohio would be glad to review, to some extent, just what that distinguished jurist said.

Justice Harlan's opinions have great weight with every lawyer as well as with every humanitarian, for if there ever was a man who lived in his time devoted both to justice and to humanity Justice Harlan was the man. This was a proceeding to punish for contempt of court because it was alleged that the employees or some of them had violated an injunction which had been issued restraining them from doing certain things. I read just a clause or two found in the opinion previous to the quotation which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from Wisconsin:

> It will be observed that the motion of the interveners does not question the power of the court to restrain acts upon the part of the employees or others which would have directly interfered with the receivers' possession of the trust property or obstructed their control and management of it as well as attempts by force, intimidation, or threats or otherwise to molest or interfere with persons who remained in the service of the receivers or with others who were willing to take the places of those withdrawing from such service.

So much was conceded upon both sides.

> But it was contended that the circuit court exceeded its powers when it enjoined the employees of the receivers from combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody, or embarrassing the operation of said railroad, and from so quitting the service of said receivers, with or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad—

This clause, says Justice Harlan—> embodies two distinct propositions—one, relating to combination and conspiracies to quit the service of the receivers with the object and intent of crippling the property or embarrassing the operation of the railroads in their charge; the other, having no reference to combinations and conspiracies to quit, or to the object and intent of any quitting, but only to employees "so quitting" as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of the railroad.

Then Justice Harlan proceeds to take up the matter of the two propositions, for he begins:

> Considering these propositions in their inverse order, we remark that the injunction against employees so quitting as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of the railroad was equivalent to a command by the court that they should remain in the active employment of the receivers—

And so forth.

Then follows the part of the opinion read by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. He did not read all of it, but he read enough of it fairly to show its import. Now I come, however, to a part of the opinion which was not read because it dealt with the first of the propositions which I have suggested. After saying that the circuit court could not lawfully enjoin the employees from quitting the service, no matter what the effect of that cessation of work might be, Justice Harlan proceeds:

> But different considerations must control in respect to the words in the same paragraph of the writs of injunction, "and from combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody, or embarrassing the operation of said railroad." We have said that if employees were unwilling to remain in the service of the receivers for the compensation prescribed for them by the revised schedules, it was the right of each one on that account to withdraw from such service. It was equally their right, without reference to the effect upon the property or upon the operation of the road, to confer with each other upon the subject of the proposed reduction in wages, and to withdraw in a body from the service of the receivers because of the proposed change. Indeed, their right, as a body of employees affected by the proposed reduction in wages, to demand given rates of compensation as a condition of their remaining in the service, was as absolute and perfect as was the right of the receivers representing the aggregation of persons, creditors, and stockholders interested in the trust property, and the general public, to fix the rates they were willing to pay their respective employees. But that is a very different matter from a combination and conspiracy among employees, with the object and intent not simply of quitting the service of the receivers because of the reduction of wages but of crippling the property in their hands and embarrassing the operation of the railroad. When the order for the original injunction was applied for it was represented—and the interveners admit by their motion that it was correctly represented—that unless the restraining power of the court was exerted the dissatisfied employees and others cooperating with them would physically disable and render unfit for use—

And so forth. Then I read further——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, right there, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, in view of the language just quoted from the learned justice, let me ask the Senator if he sees any difference between the principle laid down by the justice and the language of section 30 of this bill, which makes it unlawful "to enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons"?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not. It has seemed to me all the while that we are not making it unlawful for men to quit their employment——

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Either singly or in a body. While the case from the Sixty-third Federal Report did involve an attempt to do physical injury, in one phase, to the property, yet the reasoning of Justice Harlan clearly shows that if the employees enter into a combination or a conspiracy or an agreement to quit for the purpose——

Mr. POMERENE. That is it.

Mr. CUMMINS. For the purpose of preventing the moving of commodities in interstate commerce, they are violating the law as it was understood then and, I think, as it is understood now. I wanted to call clearly to the attention of the Senate the fact that this bill does not make unlawful the mere cessation of employment either individually or collectively. It requires a combination or a conspiracy to prevent, hinder, or restrain the movement of commodities in interstate commerce; and, not only so, but the section of the bill to which the Senator from Ohio is referring requires that such act be also with intent to coerce the employers into a submission to the demands that are made.

Mr. POMERENE. And now may I suggest to the learned chairman of the committee also that at the time of the decision of Mr. Justice Harlan there was no statute relating to the subject? Am I not right?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is quite right about that.

Mr. POMERENE. In other words, the conclusion to which he came was based upon the common law as it existed in this country; so that, notwithstanding what has been heretofore said, we are seeking to write into the statutes what was the common law of the land as it was interpreted by Mr. Justice Harlan.

Mr. President, it has been said that similar legislation was adopted in New Zealand and New South Wales, but that it was not a success there. I do not know whether it was or not; but I can not refrain from observing that it was disclosed here yesterday, as it had been disclosed before, that in New Zealand and in New South Wales they have the socialistic form of government. Ours is not a socialistic form of government, and it will not be if I read the signs of the times aright. Our people are not socialistically inclined as are the New Zealanders.

And then, if I may quote a phrase from Virgil, "Mirabile dictu"—"wonderful to relate"—we are told that if this scheme is adopted it is going to result in the increase of wages for the workingman! Well, I hope that is so; and if it is so it ought all the more to commend itself to some of the critics rather than to be a cause for its condemnation.

No, Mr. President; I recognize the fact that in this country there are certain elements that would destroy the Government if they could. Now, do not misunderstand that remark. I believe that the vast majority of all these laboring classes are absolutely law-abiding, love their country, want to obey its laws, and I am not going to insult the intelligence of any substantial portion of my fellow citizens by saying here that if the Congress of the United States sees fit to adopt this legislation it will be defied. I have a higher opinion of the law-abiding character of these men. I know many of these railway men. I feel proud to count them among my best friends.

They are a part of the bone and sinew of this country, and my guess is that if in the wisdom of the Congress this law, which is meant for their protection as well as for the protection of the public, is passed, they will comply with it, and they will not go back to the old system where some one says "strike" and the strike is on, "work" and the work begins. I feel that I am a free-born American citizen, but I do not think it is inconsistent with free-born American citizenship to say that as some strikes are conducted they smack of involuntary servitude.

Senators, I recognize the fact that every man, when he is called upon to vote on this measure, must assume the responsibility for his action. It is sometimes said that I am a little bit too serious. Perhaps I am; but I want to say to the Senate that when the people of the great Commonwealth of Ohio, nearly 5,000,000 in number, sent me as their ambassador to the United States Senate to represent them, and, after a service of one term, returned me again for another six years, I think the commission with which they honored me demands that I shall do that which I think will be for the best interests of the people of my State and my country as a whole. If I have misjudged, I shall take the consequences. Service in the United States Senate is a great honor; I always regard it as such; but if one must surrender his convictions after much thought and study, I would rather not be a member of the Senate. As Luther said at the Diet of Worms, "I can not otherwise."

I have given, in this very frank way, some of the reasons which prompt me to support these strike provisions; and, in my judgment, if they are adopted they will redound not only to the benefit of the public as a whole, but to the benefit of the railway men and their families as well.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 213) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate the amendment of the House to Senate bill 3284.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President is authorized to continue during the year ending December 31, 1920, the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, and to vote or use the stock in such corporation held by him for the benefit of the United States, or otherwise exercise his control over the corporation and its directors, in such a manner as to authorize and require them to adopt and carry out until December 31, 1920, plans and methods of securing, if found necessary for the public good, an adequate supply and an equitable distribution of sugar at a fair and reasonable price to the people of the United States. Sections 5 and 10 of the act entitled "An act to further provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, as far as the same relates to raw or refined sugar, sirups, or molasses, are hereby continued in full force and effect until December 31, 1920, notwithstanding the provisions of section 24 of said act: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall expire as to the domestic product September 30, 1920: And provided further, That the zone system of sale and distribution of sugars heretofore established by the said United States Sugar Equalization Board shall be abolished and shall not be reestablished or maintained, and that sugars shall be permitted to be sold and to circulate freely in every portion of the United States. The termination of this act shall not affect any act done, or any right or obligation accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said termination pursuant to this act; but all rights and liabilities under this act arising before its termination shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if the act had not terminated. Any offense committed and all penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to such termination, may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been terminated.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in view of the importance of this legislation and the necessity for its early passage, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment adopted by the House.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Calder	Dial	Fernald
Bankhead	Capper	Dillingham	Fletcher
Beckham	Colt	Edge	Frelinghuysen
Borah	Cummins	Elkins	Gay
Brandegee	Curtis	Fall	Gerry

Gronna	King	Overman	Townsend
Hale	Knox	Page	Trammell
Harding	La Follette	Phipps	Underwood
Harris	Lenroot	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Harrison	McCormick	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Henderson	McKellar	Ransdell	Warren
Hitchcock	McNary	Sheppard	Watson
Johnson, S. Dak.	Moses	Sherman	Williams
Jones, Wash.	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Kellogg	New	Stanley
Kenyon	Newberry	Sutherland
Keyes	Norris	Thomas

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understand that just before the call for a quorum a motion was made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to concur in the amendment made by the House to a certain bill which has passed the Senate. Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. I make the point of order that the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi is not in order. It can not be that we may now leave, without action of a majority of the Senate at any rate, the railroad bill, which we are considering, in order to take up some other bill which may be pending.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think perhaps if I make a statement it will clarify the mind of the Senator having in charge the railroad bill. A few moments ago I asked unanimous consent that the Chair should lay before the Senate what is known as the sugar bill, and I assume that unanimous consent was granted. The substitute bill of the House was then read, following which the Senator from Mississippi made the motion to concur.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear the Senator from Oregon make any such request. I heard the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, and I take it that proceeding on the part of the Chair was entirely in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will permit the Chair, he will state to the Senator from Oregon that under the rules of the Senate the Chair can present to the Senate at any time a message from the other House. Unanimous consent does not have to be obtained.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no question about that, and I have no objection whatever to that procedure, but I do object to laying aside the railroad bill for the purpose of taking up another measure, the debate on which, I am advised, will probably take longer than the time needed to conclude the consideration of the railroad bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not advised whether there are any precedents with reference to a matter of this kind, and the Chair is not very familiar with the procedure of the Senate in such a case. The Chair is disposed to sustain the point of order. The message will remain on the table. However, the Senate can take such action as it sees fit.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, if there had been any request for unanimous consent, I should have objected, being on the floor when the Senator from Oregon rose. It was my understanding that the matter was simply laid before the Senate by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, when the message was laid before the Senate the bill was before the Senate, and then I made the motion to concur. I would not have made the motion if the Presiding Officer had not laid the bill before the Senate, and it does seem to me that it is properly before the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Mississippi that the privilege of laying the bill before the Senate ended with that action, and it is on the table. The Chair has sustained the point of order of the Senator from Iowa with reference to taking it up at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 3284 and the amendment of the House to the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That involves the same question that was presented the other day, whether the railroad bill shall be displaced by the sugar bill. I did everything in my power to facilitate the consideration of the sugar bill when it was up the other day, but I can not, in justice to the railroad bill and the great interests it concerns, consent to entering upon a long debate upon that measure. I make the point of order that in any event a message from the House of Representatives must lie over one day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is no rule to that effect. The Senator from Mississippi has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House to the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly the rule provides that the message may be received at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the House has been laid before the Senate and is now on the table.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], if he will give me his attention, that I think it would be very unfortunate at this time to enter upon a debate on that particular question. It would take a long time to dispose of it. I think the bill ought to go to conference. I do not anticipate that we would have any trouble in disposing of it in that way.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is necessary, if we are going to pass any legislation upon the subject, that early action upon the bill should be taken by the Senate. A few days ago a motion was made to lay aside the railroad bill and take up the sugar bill. At that time it was only on the calendar, had not been passed by the House, and had not been considered by the Senate. By a very close vote at that time the Senate refused to set aside the railroad bill to take up the sugar legislation.

After that time we came to an agreement and passed the bill through the Senate. It had been before the Senate since October 3, for 10 weeks, with sugar soaring upward, English capitalists trying to purchase the Cuban crop, and we fiddling while Rome was burning.

It took the House not over 24 hours to pass the bill. They passed a real bill. They have passed a bill that will give substantial relief to the situation. It seems to me, if we are to give any relief to the country, the Senate ought to take immediate action and pass this legislation.

I do not anticipate any prolonged debate. I can not understand why there should be much opposition to a bill like this, when it will not only supply sugar to the consuming masses but will cut down the price from 17 cents to a reasonable price, and if we are to act we must act immediately. The export of the Cuban crop of sugar will begin about the first of the year, and if we wait until this railroad legislation is out of the way we may never get any legislation on the subject.

If this question should go to conference, here is the situation: No doubt the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] would be one of the conferees. If my recollection serves me correctly, he was not in favor of this legislation; he was not in favor of the licensing proposition. That is a fair statement, I think, touching the Senator's position.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator believe that we can pass the bill as it was passed in the House?

Mr. HARRISON. I hope so.

Mr. GRONNA. Without any discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not say without any discussion.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Mississippi, who is a very valuable member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and a valuable member of any committee upon which he serves, must know that he can not charge the Senate of the United States with the responsibility of fiddling while Rome was burning. The Senator knows that the testimony of the Sugar Equalization Board will show, especially the testimony of Mr. Zabriskie, that the President of the United States is the man who was fiddling. Not only was he authorized but he was directed to buy the Cuban sugar crop. He had the authority to buy, he had the money to buy, but he failed to buy. So I think it is out of place for the Senator from Mississippi at this time to charge the Senate of the United States with the responsibility.

The Senator knows I am telling the truth. The Senator also ought to know that the bill can not pass in the form in which it passed the House, as I understand, without extended debate, and it is in the interest of saving time that I suggested that it should go to conference.

Mr. HARRISON. The argument of the Senator from North Dakota accentuates the fact that if we want to get legislation the House amendment should be agreed to by the Senate and not be sent to the conference committee, of which the Senator might be a member, because, as he says, he is not in favor of the legislation.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I am perfectly willing to let the Senator from Mississippi have his say as to who shall be the conferees on the part of the Senate. I am perfectly willing to forego the pleasure of being a member of the conference committee so far as I am concerned. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] has been in charge of the bill. He has done, I believe, as well as any Member of the Senate could do. He has been the chairman of the subcommittee which has had control of the legislation, and I am perfectly willing to allow the Senator from Oregon to name the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that is another reason why it should not go to conference. Unfortunately, when we passed the bill the other day, because of the peculiar parliamentary status, the Senator from Oregon had to agree with the Senators from Louisiana that he would stand by the action of the Senate that day. If he should carry out his promise and be a conferee, and I am sure he would, he would never be in a position to accept the action of the House. For that reason, and for the further reason that the Senator from North Dakota is against the licensing system, it seems to me that the Senate itself ought to take action and not send it to conference, because I am quite sure that it might die there.

With respect to what the Senator from North Dakota says about Congress not being at fault, I say Congress is at fault. The Senator from North Dakota knows that this question came before the Senate about the 3d day of October. The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry began hearings about that date, and there has not been a day since October 3 when the Senate could not have taken action upon the bill and passed it and given some relief to the American people. For 10 weeks the Senate has taken no action. The House of Representatives took action within 48 hours, but here again Senators would have us put the matter off and get no relief in the end.

For the information of the Senator from North Dakota I want to read to him what appeared in the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate. This has been read into the RECORD before, but I want to burn it into the minds of some Senators, because the Senate has been at fault about the matter since the 3d day of October, because members of the Sugar Equalization Board all stated that it was necessary to obtain additional legislation before the Cuban sugar crop could be purchased.

Senator NORRIS, asking a question of Mr. Glasgow:

> I was trying to place responsibility for the nonpurchase of the crop. As I understand, they had the authority to buy it, and made a proposition to buy it if the President would authorize it.
> Mr. GLASGOW. With one other proviso. Here is the memorandum we sent to the President. It is in the record. In that memorandum we said that if the policy of the United States was to continue for the year 1920 the activities that the sugar board had been engaged in during this current year that it would be necessary to have Congress pass additional legislation continuing the authority that we exercised during the year 1920.
> We did not feel, Senator, that we were in a position, without the policy either being declared by the President and approved by Congress or the giving of the additional powers, that it would be right for us to go and purchase the sugar crop of Cuba.
>
> Senator NORRIS. As a matter of law, the authority existed at that time to buy that?
> Mr. GLASGOW. Yes, sir. But I think we would have been very culpable if we had gone on and exercised the power of the sugar board to purchase the Cuban crop of sugar unless we knew Congress desired us to continue the control and distribution for the coming year.
> Senator NORRIS. If the President had authorized you, would you have done it?
> Mr. GLASGOW. No, sir; not until Congress had given us the powers and they thought it proper. It would come back at last to the discretion of Congress as to whether they desired the distribution of sugar continued.

The chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], then said:

> You said something that I think ought to be framed in a gold frame, to the effect that you did not feel like acting until Congress had its say.

And yet Congress has had the matter before it, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, after he has uttered that beautiful expression, now says that the President of the United States is to blame. Sirs, the Congress is to blame and every Member of the Senate who is not now in favor of taking immediate action upon the proposition will have the responsibility placed upon him.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I merely want to say a word. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has stated that he understood that the bill, if taken up, would call for some discussion. I am obliged to corroborate that statement.

The sugar bill passed the Senate several days ago in a form which I think would not be very objectionable to anyone, certainly not very objectionable to the Senators from Louisiana. The House struck out all after the enacting clause and has changed the bill in very material particulars, one of which is that it extends the licensing power provided in section 5 of the Lever food-control law until the 31st day of December, 1920. It applies all the drastic war powers of the bill to sugar, sirup, molasses, and so forth, for the whole calendar year 1920. The licensing system is very objectionable to a great many people, including myself, and if the Senate attempts to vote on that measure I shall feel it my duty—and I know my colleague will feel it his duty—to discuss the matter very thoroughly.

I see no reason why the bill should not follow the usual and ordinary course and be sent to conference. I see no reason why it should seek to set aside the great railroad bill, certainly as important a measure as we have had before us in many years. I am bound to say to the chairman of the committee in charge of the railroad bill that if the sugar bill is taken up now we will discuss it at least until we have exhausted it as well as we understand it, and I think that will take considerable time; just how long I do not know. I am making no threat of filibuster, but I shall certainly try to explain to the Senate the sugar measure before the Senate votes upon it. If it can go to conference, let it go now. There is no reason why the bill and amendment should not be sent to conference just as other measures are sent to conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have just a word to say. I repeat that I do not doubt the importance of the sugar bill. It so happens, however, that many of those who are most solicitous about the sugar bill are opposed to the railroad bill, and it may be that they are not entirely impartial in coming to a conclusion in regard to which of the two measures should have precedence.

We are nearing the end, if we may judge by appearances, of the consideration of the railroad bill. It has seemed to me that we ought to reach a conclusion to-morrow at the latest. I very sincerely hope that when we look forward and see what may happen if there is no speedy, diligent disposition of the railroad bill, that the Senate will not lay it aside for the purpose of taking up the sugar bill, which, if it were to follow its usual course, would at once be referred to a conference committee.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think the country is getting a little tired of abnormal legislation and a bit more anxious to return to ordinary, normal ways of doing business. I think that perhaps the one exception the country would make to obedience to that rule is in case of a necessary of life. Sugar is not a necessary of life. I remember two or three years of my life when the Confederacy was waging war upon the balance of the United States when we had no sugar at all, and got along very well without it.

Besides that, Mr. President, the best way in the world to reduce profiteers to order and to bring about a normal scale of prices is to encourage overproduction of a thing being at that time underproduced, so that the men who want to profiteer at the expense of the public may be encouraged to overproduce their products until they find that they have overproduced, and that those engaged in that condition of overproduction are compelled finally to take even less than the cost to produce. That is the usual rule. That will follow here if you let the matter alone.

Now, of course, if it were a matter of bread or of meat or of some necessary of life, the Government might continue its war activities. But this is a question merely of sugar, confections principally, because most of the sugar goes into confections. The amount that goes into your coffee and tea is not the major amount of it at all.

So it seems to me that the present duty of the Senate is very plain, and that is to carry the railroad bill to a finish one way or the other, getting a final vote upon it and sending it to conference, and in conference make the House conferees and the Senate conferees agree to something and bring that something back before the two Houses with a view to having it dealt with. I started to say dealt with by the intelligence of the Nation, but, of course, that would not be true, for it would have to be dealt with by the two Houses of Congress instead of by the intelligence of the Nation.

But, Mr. President, it is, above all things, necessary that we should take out of the arena of public discussion at this moment the great transportation question upon which depends nearly everything. Do with it whatsoever you please. Doing anything with it will be better than doing nothing. I have a very clearly defined notion about what I want to do; so every other Senator has the same sort of notion about what he wants to do; but whatever those notions may be, as it strikes me now, the thing to do is to carry this bill forward to its ultimate conclusion and then to settle, temporarily at any rate, the transportation question, so that the country shall be at ease. That is not all, Mr. President.

After the transportation question is out of the way there are many other questions that must be taken up and considered. In comparison with them, sugar is nothing; confections are nothing; candy is nothing; sweet cakes are nothing. Sugar is not a necessary of life. Any man with an average stomach can get along without it for two years. I did it once; the whole South did it once. Nobody's health was affected. Dr. Harvey Wiley, the best chemist in the United States, the other day said sugar was not a necessity of life. It is not a necessary of any description. The old Democratic Party that fixed a tariff on luxuries fixed a tariff upon sugar because it was a luxury, while it never fixed a tariff upon breads and meats, for they were necessities of life. So I hope, Mr. President, we shall not allow any special privileges, at any rate, to this bill or to any other bill until we have disposed of the railroad bill.

Now, there is another thing, Mr. President. Unless we do dispose of the railroad bill by the time that we have tentatively fixed for our Christmas holiday adjournment, we have got to stay here until we do dispose of it. I do not want to stay; I am tired of it; most of you are tired of it. So the best thing for us to do is to send the railroad bill to conference in some shape or other. I shall try to shape it in my own way; so will every other Senator. After it gets there, then, immediately after the Christmas holidays, we can pass it; but at any rate, Mr. President, to allow the enemies of the railroad bill to use the sugar question as a means of delaying the consideration of the railroad bill would be utterly stupid for those of us who want to settle the railroad question, one way or the other. That is what is going on; I do not say upon the part of any particular Senator, of course, but I mean that at the bottom of it all there is a certain element which is opposed to the railroad bill that is willing to vote to take up anything, whether sugar or anything else, in order to delay final conclusion of the Senate upon the transportation question.

Mr. President, transportation in modern civilization is at the root and bottom of everything. You can not even get fuel without it; you can not get food without it; you can not get clothes without it; you can not do anything without satisfactory transportation. We have passed beyond the period when one little neighborhood could supply the next little neighborhood with its food and with its garments. We have come to the period where a great interstate and international transport system must feed and clothe the world, and we ought to settle that. The idea of getting out of the way here and there, for sugar or for goober peas, peanuts that become candy, or anything else nonconsequential, is, in my opinion, absolutely absurd.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I promised to pair with him during that absence, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NEWBERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire if the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). When I cast my vote I overlooked the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I notice he is temporarily out of the Chamber, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. As he has not voted, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire if the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is detained from the Senate on official business. If present he would vote "nay."

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is absent on official business.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is detained on official business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—23.

So Mr. HARRISON's motion was rejected.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, on Saturday last I introduced two resolutions pertaining to the treaty of peace with Germany and asked unanimous consent for the consideration of those resolutions in the order in which I propose to renew the request.

I ask unanimous consent, as in open executive session, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 1, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 1) submitted by Mr. KNOX on December 12 (calendar day of December 13), 1919, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States unreservedly advises and consents to the ratification of the treaty of Versailles in so far only as it provides for the creation of a status of peace between the United States and Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. KNOX. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 136, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 136) introduced by Mr. KNOX on December 12 (calendar day of December 13), 1919, was read, as follows:

Joint resolution declaring that a state of peace exists between the United States and Germany.

Resolved, etc., That peace exists between the United States and Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. NELSON. I object.

Mr. McKELLAR. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations reported to the Senate a resolution of ratification of the treaty with Germany, which, after a protracted debate on the floor, it seemed to me was likely to have been passed, that it would have received the two-thirds vote of the Senate with the reservations recommended by the committee and modified upon the floor. The President of the United States voluntarily advised the Members of his own party to vote against that resolution of ratification, which they did, with the result that it went down to defeat.

A few days afterwards two impassioned speeches were made upon the floor of the Senate on the other side of the aisle, one by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the other by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], imploring that the two sides of the Chamber should get together, and in a spirit of amity and in a spirit of compromise agree upon the conditions that should be attached to the ratification of the treaty. Heart-rending descriptions were given of the condition of the world, all of which was to be accounted for by the fact that this treaty had failed of ratification by the Senate of the United States. A day or two afterwards the President of the United States, by his own volition, announced to the public that no compromise on the question of reservations to the ratification of the treaty would be accepted by him; and his statement on that subject is final, because it makes no difference upon what conditions the Senate advises and consents to the ratification, the President, and the President alone, can determine whether he will accept reservations and conditions, and whether he will exchange ratifications upon the conditions advised by the Senate. So that to me, Mr. President, it seemed obvious, in view of the attitude the President had taken, both toward reservations and toward compromise, that we should make every effort in this body to reach a solution of this question; and I want the public to understand that the parliamentary situation is such that these resolutions which I have offered, either of which would solve the problem, can not be considered by the Senate except by unanimous consent, and I want the second time to have it appear that unanimous consent is impossible.

There is, however, Mr. President, another route by which we may travel, and by which we may possibly get results, and that is by reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and a report from that body. I therefore ask that both resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the peace treaty with Germany. I do so not for the purpose of ascertaining who has been responsible for the delay but with the hope that we may agree on reservations and ratify the treaty without further delay.

There has been no lack of recognition by the Senate of the importance of closing the peace treaty with Germany. Had not the covenant of the league of nations been attached to the peace treaty with Germany, that treaty would have been ratified months ago.

The majority of the Senators are convinced that reservations should be made a part of the ratification of the peace treaty, because they are necessary to make clear doubtful provisions in the covenant and thereby avoid future disputes and wars; because they are necessary to prevent power which should be exercised by the Congress from being transferred 3,000 miles away, to nine men, eight of whom are foreigners; and because they are necessary to leave the Congress entirely free to perform its constitutional duties when an effort is made to spend the money of our taxpayers and to sacrifice the lives of our boys in the wars of the world.

For months it has been apparent that the covenant of the league of nations would not be approved without reservations covering the subjects to which I have referred. A study of the reservations voted for by the majority and reservations voted for or offered by the minority shows that more than two-thirds of the Senators have expressed themselves with reasonable certainty in favor of reservations which will accomplish the objects in view.

Most of these reservations suggested from different sides vary more in language than in substance. Senators have vied with each other in urging the importance of ratifying the treaty and in charging opposing sides with responsibility for the delay. Let us cease trying to find out who is responsible for the delay and bring the delay to an end.

Party politics should not be played over a question of such importance, involving our international relations. I believe that the party should and will be most injured which seeks most to make this treaty a party football.

The statement from the White House that President Wilson "has no compromise or concession of any kind in mind" only emphasizes the fact that the treaty is still in the Senate and that it is for the Senate to agree upon reservations and ratify the treaty. This surely can be done.

To insist that the President should withdraw the treaty just to send it back is entirely unreasonable. The Senate already has the treaty and has authority to perfect a resolution of ratification. At any time a majority of the Senate can take up the treaty. Certainly two-thirds of the Senate can do so by suspending any rule, if there is a rule, in the way of action.

The vote in the Senate indicates that much less than a third of the Senators are opposed to ratifying the treaty with proper reservations. Reservations voted for by more than two-thirds of the Senators are so similar in substance that conference alone should be required to make the language satisfactory to a sufficient number of Senators to ratify the treaty.

But we will make no progress through crimination and recrimination, and through efforts to place the blame upon this or that side for the delay. Ratification of the treaty must be by nonpartisan action, and every effort to create partisan advantage hinders ratification of the treaty.

I do not believe there are more than 16 Senators who wish the treaty killed, and I do not believe there are 10 more who are opposed to reservations of any kind. If I am right as to the sentiment of the Senate, ratification with reservations should not long be delayed.

If the Senators who now wish to ratify the treaty with reservations will confer over the subject, they will find how close they are together, how easy it is, I believe, to agree upon reservations that 64 Senators can support, and I am confident that we can agree and can act.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I take this occasion to say that I am very heartily in favor of the Senate, of its own initiative and in its own way, resuming consideration of the peace treaty, compromising its differences, coming to an agreement, and ratifying the treaty. In my opinion the Senate is and has been making a political football of the peace treaty, and all of the football playing has not been on one side. It has not all been confined to either side. In my opinion, there has been politics on both sides in the contest. I think it is largely politics which is keeping the Senate apart on the treaty now, keeping it from agreeing, and I believe politics should be laid aside, and that we should get together and compromise our differences; and I, for one, am willing to compromise.

At the last session of Congress I voted for two reservations that were adopted, and if the matter comes up again I intend to vote for more reservations and amendments this time than I did last time, in the interest of compromising and getting together. The business conditions of the country and of the world are unsettled; we can not get back to normal prewar conditions until the peace treaty and league of nations is ratified. The way the matter stands now, the majority of the Republican Senators are not willing to vote for the treaty as the majority of the Democrats want it, and the majority of the Democratic Senators are not willing to vote for it as the majority of the Republicans want it. So it was during the entire time of the session recently ended, at which the treaty was under consideration. Neither side would yield.

In my opinion, it has been due largely to political obstinacy on each side. There the matter stands, but I do not think it should be allowed to stand there longer. On the last night of the last session of Congress, I voted to ratify the treaty with all of the Lodge reservations, and I voted to ratify it without any reservations. The next time I am prepared to go even further than that, and to do more than that, if possible, in order to ratify the treaty, and bring to an end the existing state of suspense and uncertainty of conditions in this country and in the world. I do not believe we should wait for the treaty to be withdrawn from this body and sent back, which would be a mere useless formality; but I believe this body should of its own initiative and power take up the matter and arrive at a compromise, ratify the treaty and league, get it out of the way, and send the country forward in a sane and natural way, and let us proceed to other business. Politics should be eliminated. This is a matter which should be put far above politics. I favor early action.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate just a moment.

One of the two resolutions that have been offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is simply a declaration of peace, and a statement that the war between our country and Germany has ended.

The other resolution, which aims to cover the matter from another standpoint, is, to my mind, vague and indefinite. If the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is to ratify all portions of the treaty except those portions that pertain to the covenant of the league of nations, the resolution ought to say so.

Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the treaty with reservations that we can agree upon, and if we can not have that, I would vote for a resolution ratifying all of the treaty of peace except what pertains to the covenant of the league of nations.

But that ought to be clearly expressed in the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I suggest to him that in case we can adopt the treaty with reservations he modify his resolution so as to make it perfectly clear that we ratify all of the treaty of peace except what pertains to the covenant of the league of nations.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] evinces, I was going to say, a breadth of view, but perhaps I would better say a breadth of purpose, which during the last session of Congress was not always manifest yonder on his side.

It would be interesting to some of us who supported certain amendments to the treaty, which were defeated, to learn if those who now discuss a modification of the reservations contemplate such modification as will give to the United States the same representation in the league of nations as that accorded another great power. The issue of the representation of the United States in the league was raised not once but several times during the last session by successive amendments or reservations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me just a word?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. While I mentioned three of the reservations embodying principles that I considered essential, I wish to add that I am still earnestly in favor of the reservation prepared by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and I hope that reservation, which I think clearly takes care of us, so far as the six votes of Great Britain are concerned, will be a part of the resolution of ratification.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is precisely because some of us do not feel that the reservation of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] takes care of us, that I have risen to ask if those who propose a reconsideration of the terms of ratification now propose that the United States shall have as many votes in the league of nations as any other power?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator will permit me to finish——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought the Senator meant that as a question.

Mr. McCORMICK. It was said during the debate which closed with the last session, and it was repeated, that those of us who insisted upon an equality of representation for the United States sought to disfranchise the self-governing dominions of the British Empire. That was not true. We testified to the services which they had rendered during the war. We bore witness to our belief in their democratic purposes. We insisted only that since six votes were accorded to the British Imperial Federation, with half the self-governing population of this country, as many votes should be secured for the United States by amendments to the treaty adopted in the Senate of the United States.

The reservation offered during the last session by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in my judgment, is a poor substitute for an equality of representation. I believe now, as I believed then, that if ever the covenant of the league be approved by the Senate, with whatever reservations, but without provision for that equal representation, the issue will not down, any more than the issue of slavery was put down through successive compromises, so called, adopted by the Congress of the United States. The issue of "6 to 1" will live here in Congress, on the stump, in the great cities, and at the cross-roads in the country. The covenant under these circumstances will not make for accord, but for discord, between the English-speaking peoples.

Men have borne witness, in the Parliaments of the federated States which make up the British Empire, to their belief that logic is on our side. One of them, for 16 years a minister of the British Crown, has asserted that the State of New York is more important to the Republic than the Dominion of Canada is to the Empire. Mr. President, when Englishmen can speak for justice and equal representation for the United States, the American people will not rest under the injustice which here in the Senate it has been the purpose to do them.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will turn to page 35, my amendment seeks to strike out the authorization to give a guarantee to the railroads pending reorganization. It went over from last night. I have been given to understand that the opposition has been withdrawn. I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate in further discussion of it if that be true.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there was an amendment pending to that part of the bill known as the long-and-short-haul clause, offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. Is that now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was laid aside, and so it is aside until called up again. There is nothing now pending before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy much time of the Senate in discussing this bill. I doubt, however, if anybody is more deeply interested in it than I am. During all of my life in Congress I have been a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, either in the House or in the Senate, and, as you know, these committees have jurisdiction of railroad matters. No one, I think, appreciates more keenly than I do the magnitude of this question, and its particularly serious nature at this time. If I thought it would do any good, if I believed that Senators, or any considerable number of them, cared for my opinion in reference to the measure, I would be very glad to express it in detail. But I have never been in the habit of talking simply for the RECORD, and shall not do so now. I am somewhat disturbed at what seems to be indifference to the subject, for it is of vital interest to the country, and yet the Chamber has been practically vacant during all of its discussion.

I have, however, two or three suggestions which I shall submit. I have listened to the discussion in opposition to this bill, and not always with a great deal of patience. The most bitter opposition to the measure came from a Senator who was a member of the committee, and yet during all the weeks of conscientious and full consideration of the bill by the committee I never heard him make one single constructive suggestion before the committee while we were considering the bill. I was on the committee for the purpose of trying to frame the very best bill possible, and I was most desirous of obtaining the intelligent ideas of Senators and of those qualified to speak who came before us. I believe that the other members of the committee were actuated by the same motives, and not all of them were novices in the subject matter.

I want to pay my tribute of respect and gratitude to the chairman of the committee [Mr. CUMMINS], who has manifested infinite patience, industry, and intelligence in the long and tiresome consideration of this measure. Each of the hundreds of men representing every interest and phase of the railroad question who appeared before us was given full opportunity to express his views and was treated with uniform patience and courtesy.

The committee framed and reported a bill which does not meet in every respect with the approval of any Senator. It is seldom that such bill does meet the ideal of its proponents. It is, however, a measure which, in my judgment, will solve approximately correctly the railroad problem, as it is presently complicated. It, for the first time, as it seems to me, in the history of railroad legislation, has for its cardinal principle protection of the people's rights. There is nothing in this measure, notwithstanding any statements which may be made to the contrary, which has in view the serving of any special interest. It recognizes the fact that the railroad question must be solved in justice to the people who pay dividends and wages. It is known that there are what are called weak roads and strong ones. The latter require regulation and restraint principally, while the former require support in addition to regulation. The committee has attempted to preserve, to make it possible to preserve, all of the necessary roads in the United States, and to enable them to furnish adequate transportation to the public at the lowest possible compensating cost.

The bill is not what the railroad owners wanted, and a statement to the contrary is in reckless disregard of the facts and the evidence as they have been disclosed. We have not sought to do anything contrary to the lawful and proper interests of the railroads, because we have known that any other course would be against the general welfare for which railroads are chartered and supported. We must have prosperous railroads in order to have general prosperity. But we never consciously lost sight of the fact that common carriers should serve and not control the public interest.

It is not a bill framed in the interest of the railroad employees, although every one of their rights is protected in harmony with the same principles which have been applied to owners. We provide a new and somewhat radical provision for handling disturbances between operators and their employees which disastrously affect the general welfare. I wish briefly to discuss that particular matter, because it is one of the things to which I wish briefly to direct the attention of the Senate.

We have in the bill what is known as an antistrike provision. It was thought absolutely necessary that Congress should do something to protect the people of the United States against threatened disasters which were impending at that time and which are now impending. We recognize that the railroads are chartered by the Government for the benefit of the people. That is the primary object in establishing and maintaining transportation companies. We know that unless the Government furnishes the money itself the money must be furnished by what are known as railroad owners and the railroads must be operated by what are known as employees. The owner is entitled to a reasonable return upon the property in which he honestly invests for the public welfare. The laboring man is entitled to a reasonable wage or salary for what he actually contributes to the success of the road. But it is unthinkable that any longer in this country employers and employees should be able to get together and fix wages and prices without regard to the rights of those who pay them. It is to me a monstrous thought that capital and labor can without let or hindrance starve and freeze and ruin the people in a struggle for supremacy.

Let me say here by way of parenthesis that a number of times since I have been in Congress—six times, to be exact—I have introduced a bill in the House and Senate providing for compulsory investigation of the questions growing out of the controversies between capital and labor. Every time that measure has been opposed by both capital and labor. Capital opposed it because it might involve an investigation of the accounts and methods of business.

Labor was opposed to it because it might lead ultimately to compulsory arbitration. Yet I have on my desk a printed statement which was sent out by Mr. Lewis, national president of the United Mine Workers of America, to his followers, explaining the agreement which he had recently made with the representatives of the Government, and stating that he had been promised a commission composed of three men, one an operator, one a miner, and another man, and that the findings of the commission as to prices and labor and working conditions were to be final. Mr. Lewis stated that was a great victory. But that is compulsory arbitration. Possibly this particular agreement contained other understandings than those submitted to writing, but on its face it is a provision for compulsory arbitration.

I favor compulsory investigation, believing that the public, when properly informed, would settle all of these great questions between capital and labor. So when the question came before the committee I was perfectly satisfied to provide for the boards for settlement of controversies between employers and employees and allow public opinion to do the rest, except that it was my desire to provide in the bill that there should be no conspiracy to strike permitted while the investigation was being carried on, and until the board had finally rendered its decision. I wanted to stop there. I did not care to go any further than that at this time because I thought that would be effective. That was my position before the committee and that is my position now. An amendment to that end will receive my vote.

I repeat that when the facts have been disclosed as to the controversy that exists between capital and labor, between owners and railroad employees, I think the strike will proceed no further because the party at fault would necessarily have to surrender to force of public opinion.

There is another thing of which I wish to speak. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has introduced an amendment striking out, as I understand it, the provision of the bill which has relation to the long-and-short-haul clause. Senators will understand that under existing law we have a prohibition against a greater charge for a longer distance than for a shorter distance, the latter being within the former, except under certain conditions. It is the exception which the Senator wishes to eliminate.

I know that in the West, and especially in the Northwest, there is complaint that the charge for the longer haul is less than the charge for the shorter distances sometimes. That seems to be inequitable, and per se it is so; but I want Senators to understand that we are now confronted with a condition and not a theory. The system of rate fixing has existed in the country for many, many years. Cities have been builded; the whole country has been established upon these arrangements. Some of them have been wrong. It has been wrong and is so now to fix the longer-haul rate so low that in itself it is not compensatory; that is, it does not yield its proper portion of the expense of operation of the railroad system. Then it stands to reason that the shorter routes paying the higher proportioned rate must have an additional burden placed upon them. That is wrong.

When the committee had the bill before it I offered an amendment to that provision, which was adopted, which states positively that no rate shall be fixed by the commission which in itself is not compensatory; that is, which does not yield a proper proportion to the expense of the operation of the line. We also provided that purely latent water competition shall not be the basis for the establishment of rates. What I mean by that is this:

It has been known for a good many years that what are known as Mississippi and Missouri River points have had lower rates than longer distances on either side, because of the possibility of water competition over the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. Evidently the object of that was to keep water transportation off of both rivers. We provide in the amendment that the commission shall not grant reduced rates on account of potential water competition not in existence.

The practice of charging a lower rate proportionately for longer distances is not entirely without equity. The railroads themselves, if they are to do business with points where there is actual water competition, as, for instance, on the Pacific coast, where commerce is served by boats, must at those points meet the water-transportation rate. If those rates are not so low as to be noncompensatory, and therefore place an additional burden upon transportation for shorter distances, it seems to me there can be no harm in competitive rates. The committee amended the existing law on this subject, and I had supposed it was satisfactory to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. If you proposed a hard and fast rule looking to practically a mileage rate, if you say that under no conditions shall there be a reduction in rate for long distances to meet competition at some other point, you are disturbing a great business condition in the country in a way which, in my judgment, will be disastrous.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am afraid that some misapprehension will be created by the Senator's statement that the amendment would establish practically a mileage basis for the making of rates. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not want to be understood as stating it quite as broadly as that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was sure the Senator did not. I just wanted, in order to clear that up, to say that if the amendment is adopted there will be nothing in the bill which prevents the charging of as low a rate for a long distance as is charged for the shorter distance. For instance, under the present system, on carpets shipped from New York to Fridley, Minn., the rate is higher than it is on the same identical goods over the same line to the Pacific coast, 1,200 miles farther west. Under the bill Fridley would be enabled to get as low a rate as Seattle or Tacoma or Portland, 1,200 miles farther away from the point of shipment, but there would be nothing in the law that would require Fridley to get a lower rate. The railroads would still be able to charge on shipments to Fridley just as much as they charge to the Pacific coast. The purpose of the amendment is not to prevent that, but it is to require that Fridley, to continue the illustration, shall not be charged a higher rate. That is as far as it goes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not wish to be understood as saying that it would be the establishment of exactly a mileage rate, but I did wish to be understood as saying that it was a step in that direction. It is based more upon that principle than it is upon that of serving the different communities because of special conditions.

I desire to say here what I started to say in the first place, namely, that if we were starting anew in this country I doubt if I would have opposition to the Senator's position, but I must take conditions as they are. I wish now to refer to the language which was used in framing the amendments to the interstate-commerce act proposed by the bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the Senator from Michigan if, in his judgment, we should contemplate a gradual revision of the economic inequality which is established by this rate differential or if we should allow it to go on in perpetuity?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The answer to the Senator's first question is that we should proceed to correct it as rapidly and with as little disturbance to business as possible, and that is what we attempt to do in the amendment to the interstate-commerce act proposed in the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I shall not continue to interrupt the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. TOWNSEND. You need not hesitate to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But on the particular point referred to by the Senator from Michigan and in relation also to the question asked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], I should like to emphasize the fact that if the amendment proposed by me is adopted it will not make any sudden or extensive change in the present situation. The purpose of the amendment, in fact, is to preserve the existing situation, which is temporary in its nature, but which has been in force for some time under the Government administration of the railroads.

The point I am making is that it will not bring about any sudden dislocation or sudden shock either to the transportation system or to rival communities. It seems to me that this is a very opportune time to take advantage of the temporary conditions that have been established by the Government Railroad Administration and which have been in force for a year or more, to continue them in effect and to accomplish the reform in which the Senator is interested.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as we all know, section 4 of the interstate-commerce act, which is known as the long-and-short-haul clause, was amended so that it did actually forbid the charging of less for a long haul than for a short haul, the shorter haul being included in the longer. As I have stated, with the exception that—> the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which any designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section.

My information from the commission is that it has reduced the exceptions in many respects; that it has been trying to arrange a schedule of rates that will work as little injustice to any community as it is possible to do. Then this is what we add:

> But in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not fairly compensatory for the service performed; and if a circuitous rail line or route is, because of such circuity, granted authority to meet the charges of a more direct line or route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points on its line the authority shall not include intermediate points as to which the haul of the petitioning line or route is not longer than that of the direct line or route between the competitive points.

The commission tells me that this is practically the rule which it is now following, and that it is working out an approximately correct solution of this whole problem. Furthermore, we add:

> And no such authorization shall be granted on account of merely potential water competition not actually in existence.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a long step in the direction of correcting some of the apparent evils which are recognized to exist in the Northwest and possibly in some other sections of the country, but I do not think that at this time we should unduly and radically disturb existing conditions. I do not agree with the Senator from Washington that his amendment would not materially disturb the existing status of business throughout the United States. I think we had better not do that now; that we had better not go so far as that. Therefore, I trust the Senate will adopt the provision reported by the committee; let us try that out and see what can be accomplished by it.

Mr. President, as I have already said, there is very much I would like to say on the pending bill, but I recognize when I look over the Senate what a useless task that would be, unless I desired to talk for the RECORD; and that, I repeat, I do not care to do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment on the long-and-short-haul question which was submitted by me to the Senate on yesterday, and was passed over in order that more Senators might be present, be now laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by Mr. POINDEXTER, on page 77, beginning on line 22, with the words "Provided, however," to strike out down to and including line 17 on page 78.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Iowa desire a vote on the amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think we must vote on the amendment. If the Senator from Washington desires a quorum, he may call for it. Otherwise, I am ready for a vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I see no reason why we should not proceed to a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. [Putting the question.]

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], and therefore withhold my vote. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As I have heretofore announced, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent, on account of illness in his family, and I promised to pair with him during that absence. Therefore, I must withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], but I have been released on this bill and all amendments thereto. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. NEWBERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent from the Senate on business of the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as announced during the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I do not know how he would vote if present. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], which I do, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is absent on account of illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is absent on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is detained from the Senate on important public business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Thomas
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Kendrick	Poindexter	Williams
Curtis	King	Ransdell
Gronna	Kirby	Sheppard
Henderson	La Follette	Smoot

NAYS—41.

Ball	Gay	McNary	Townsend
Bankhead	Hale	Moses	Trammell
Calder	Harding	New	Underwood
Colt	Harris	Page	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Harrison	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kellogg	Pomerene	Warren
Elkins	Keyes	Sherman	Watson
Fernald	Knox	Simmons	Wolcott
Fletcher	Lenroot	Smith, Md.
France	McCormick	Smith, S. C.
Frelinghuysen	McLean	Stanley

NOT VOTING—29.

Beckham	Johnson, Calif.	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Penrose	Spencer
Culberson	Lodge	Phelan	Sutherland
Dial	McCumber	Pittman	Swanson
Fall	McKellar	Reed
Gerry	Myers	Robinson
Gore	Nelson	Shields

So Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on the motion presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] I voted "no." When this question was up before the Interstate Commerce Committee I voted in favor of the so-called Poindexter amendment. I am in sympathy with that amendment; but it is a matter of such very great importance, and there is such a diversity of opinion upon the subject, that my feeling is that it should have been presented in a separate bill, so that it could be determined solely upon its merits, and my fear was that if the Poindexter amendment had been adopted it might embarrass the passage of this bill. For that reason, I voted as I did.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On page 82, lines 6 to 13, I move to strike out what is known as section 41.

The chairman of the committee has been so fair and just in connection with the various amendments I have offered that I do not want to seem to impose upon him, and I know he will feel that I am not doing so; but this amendment involves in substance the same principle that has applied to many of the other amendments I have offered. The section, as it is reported by the committee, amends section 6 of the act to regulate commerce by extending the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over water carriers by giving the commission the power to establish minimum rates. The law as it is now, paragraph (b) of section 6, gives the Interstate Commerce Commission power "to establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail and water lines." I make no objection to that, but I do oppose extending the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish minimum rates over water routes, and that is what the provision in the Senate bill, as reported, in section 41, does.

As I understand, the House committee reported a similar provision, but when the matter came up in the House that provision was stricken out. Objections have come from all parts of the country against the Interstate Commerce Commission interfering with water rates, and especially should the Interstate Commerce Commission not have authority to fix a minimum rate. The water transportation companies should have the right to fix any rate that they desire to fix, so far as the minimum is concerned. We have had complaints heretofore that railroads have written their rates for the purpose of putting water carriers out of business. Here, apparently, would be a provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission could use, if they desired to use it, to prevent business from going to water carriers from railroads. Now, I do not believe that the chairman or the committee desire anything of that sort, and that is the reason why I move to strike this out, so as to leave the law to stand as it is, leaving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix the maximum rates but not to fix minimum rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the question raised by the Senator from Washington is one which for many years has concerned the people of the country who have had to do with the regulation of commerce. It is one upon which there may very well be difference of opinion. I grant that at once.

The act to regulate commerce, as it is now, reads as follows:

> To establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail-and-water lines and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced.

It would be dogmatic if I were to attempt to insist that there is not room for fair difference of opinion with respect to this subject. If I understand the matter correctly, the Interstate Commerce Commission, after long study, reached the conclusion that their powers should be broadened and extended to the establishment of minimum rates as well as maximum rates. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that it would be well if this subject could be within the jurisdiction of the conference committee, if this bill ever reaches a conference, when it would be worked out, I hope, to the advantage of the whole country. If his motion prevails, the subject will not be in conference and the law will remain as it is now, with no opportunity on the part of the conferees to consider the respective arguments upon the one side or the other of this very important matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the committee of the House had taken the view of this matter that the House took of it, I would not be so fearful of the conference; but the House committee reported this, showing that the House committee is in favor of the proposition to which I object. Therefore the conferees on the part of the House, while they are supposed to represent the views of the House, will personally be in favor of the provision that the Senate has reported, and I can very well imagine about how strenuously they will oppose the provision of the Senate; and that is one reason why I do not think the matter ought to go to conference, in addition to what I look upon, of course, as the merits of it.

I recognize, as the Senator says, that there is room for honest differences of opinion; but the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has recommended it does not appeal very strongly to me, because I feel that the Interstate Commerce Commission is primarily looking after the interests of the railroads, and that it will look after the interests of the railroads in fixing the rates on the water routes; and I think this is a provision that would be especially in the interest of the public, that the water carriers be left free to make any minimum rate that they desire to make. As I said a while ago, for that reason I do not think this ought to be left to the Interstate Commerce Commission; and I would much rather that it would not go to conference, because I would be afraid of the conference report, in view of the attitude of the committee of the House.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, all that I ask the Senate to remember in deciding the matter is this, that the bill before the Senate gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power, which it has never had, save inferentially, at any rate, to establish minimum rates upon railways.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Waterways?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; railways. The bill gives the commission the right to establish a minimum rate upon a railway precisely the same as the House bill does, and I think nearly everybody agrees that the authority ought to exist to make minimum rates in order to prevent discrimination. The general object of the whole bill is to prevent discrimination, and with this observation, I submit it to the Senate for such action as it may desire to take.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, just a word to supplement what the Senator from Washington has said. I regard the matter as quite important and desire to corroborate, as strongly as I can, the points made by the Senator from Washington. I do not see how the public can possibly be injured by leaving the law as it is. The Interstate Commerce Commission, under the existing law, has a right to fix maximum rates. The public is interested in getting just as cheap rates as possible. The Interstate Commerce Commission might, in the interest of the railways, if they felt so inclined—and I would not think of charging them with being inclined that way—fix such a minimum that shippers could not afford to use waterways when that minimum is charged. That was directly charged on the floor of the House several weeks ago by Mr. CLEARY, a Member of Congress from New York, and I will read just a brief extract from his speech. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 15, 1919, page 8611:

> Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I might give some illustration as to the working of this abuse. Last year, for instance, a delegation from New York came down here in vacation time, and I came with them. The people from various parts of New York State came, and we waited upon Mr. McAdoo because the Erie Canal was not being conducted successfully. I did most of the talking with Mr. McAdoo, as I was familiar with the situation. I told him that the canal has got to have a very much lower rate than the rail to get any business.
> That is so, for various reasons. There is, for instance, the insurance, and also the fact that the shippers were more familiar with shipping by rail than by boat, and they did not have to ship in such large quantities, and all those things. I suggested that there was something that he should do, that he should name a rate from New York to all points west by rail, and then he should name a rate ex boats from Buffalo, so that the boats might carry it for any rate they pleased between New York and Buffalo, and thus give people the benefit of the canal. His reply to that was that he could not afford to let the water routes do what they wanted to because he had to protect the railroads. That is an illustration.

I assume that statement is absolutely correct. As stated by the Senator from Washington, the public is anxious to get just as low rates as possible, and if boats are given a free hand to charge whatever they wish, surely the general public can not be injured.

I sincerely hope the amendment of the Senator from Washington will be agreed to and the law be allowed to stand in this respect as it has been for some time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the principal objection in my mind to the section is to the latter part, where it refers to maximum proportional rates, using the words "maximum and minimum proportional rates," instead of, as in the original act, "maximum proportional rates." That would give the Interstate Commerce Commission entire jurisdiction of the rates on a waterway if the carriage were entirely on the waterway. I do not think we want to go so far as to give them jurisdiction to fix maximum and minimum rates on waterways where the carriage is practically entirely by water. Therefore I think the section ought to be stricken out.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask the Senator, Why should not the Interstate Commerce Commission have the power to regulate rates on water carriers the same as on rail carriers? They are supposed to be acting for the best interests of the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think it would be wise to give that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me suggest to the Senator that the Interstate Commerce Commission was created primarily to look after the railroads and the interests of the railroads, and protect the public, of course, from the exactions of the railroads. I think they consider that that is their main duty and their main responsibility, and if you give them jurisdiction over the waterways, you will find, wherever a waterway tends to divert the traffic from the railroad in a way that might injure the railroad, they will stop it. We have been complaining for a long time that our waterways have not been put to use. We have a provision in this bill requiring the board to investigate and recommend to Congress means and methods by which we can increase our water transportation. I may be mistaken, but if we have a provision like this, in my judgment we may never have water transportation developed on our inland waterways.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if this were going to militate against water transportation, I would not be for it; but I say, with all due respect, I think my learned friend from Washington misconceives the effect of this proposal.

As I understand the practices of the railroad companies, in years gone by, when there was only a maximum rate provided, the railroads had the power to reduce those rates as much as they might deem wise, looking at the matter wholly from a selfish standpoint. As a result, the railroads succeeded in driving water transportation off the face of the earth.

Later on Congress adopted an amendment which in effect provided that if they should reduce the rates to a given point, they could not thereafter advance them. I may not be stating the principle with entire accuracy, but that is the substance of it.

Before the amendment to which I have referred, the railroad companies would adopt the practice of lowering the rates, driving the boats off of the river, and then raising the rates. It was supposed that the amendment would cure that evil, but it has not cured it, for this reason: If a powerful railroad company could reduce the rates below a living rate, they could destroy the water-transportation company. In other words, they could kill, and they did kill, a competitor, and having killed the competitor, they would have the freight and the business theretofore going to the railroad company as well as the business of the dead competitor; and in that respect they had an advantage.

It was because the committee had this information in its possession, and because the Interstate Commerce Commission felt that if they had the power to fix both a maximum and minimum rate they could to a certain extent prevent the continuance of the past conduct of the railroads, that the bill was drawn in this way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would have no objection to the Interstate Commerce Commission having the power to fix minimum rates for the railroads. That is really what I was aiming at.

Mr. POMERENE. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it would have the effect of preventing the fixing of a minimum rate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suppose it would, probably, under this minimum on railroads.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is asking more than he really desires.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am perfectly willing to take the time to prepare an amendment, or have the committee prepare an amendment, that will so amend paragraph (b) as to cover the railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Ohio that the section that is sought to be stricken out does not give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix a minimum rate upon a water haul; nor did the section in the act to regulate commerce, for which it is to be substituted, give to the commission the power to fix a minimum rate, or a maximum rate, either, upon a water haul. The section relates wholly to a joint rate, a rate covering a route that is partly by land and partly by water.

The act as it is now says to the commission that a joint rate over such a route can be established by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The bill before the Senate says that the commission can fix not only a maximum joint rate, but a minimum joint rate as well; that is, a rate which shall apply for the entire haul both on land and water. That is the whole effect of the amendment. We do not propose, and never have proposed, to take a water haul as distinguished from a joint land and water haul and establish rates for the water haul.

The word "proportional" referred to by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] means simply that the Interstate Commerce Commission can divide the land and water rate so that either the land carrier or the water carrier can receive a less proportion of that joint rate than the local rate would be if the two hauls were entirely independent. There is no suggestion here of invading the province of the water carriers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the chairman will permit me to interpolate, the question was presented to the subcommittee, at least, as to whether we should take up the fixing of water rates—that is, where the rates were wholly by water—and we decided, after considerable discussion, that we would not take it up. I can assure the Senator from Washington that the explanation which has been given by the chairman of the committee is in entire accord with my own judgment about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is true, from the language here, and I can see how the Interstate Commerce Commission could use even the power over joint rates to discourage and prevent the water carrier from taking the freight and diverting the full through route over the railroad. That is what I want to prevent. I do not want to give them the opportunity to do it. I do not think the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the power, if they desire to do so, to prohibit water carriers from putting their rate away down on a joint haul.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing to prevent that. The Interstate Commerce Commission has that power now. Does the Senator from Washington desire to take that away from the commission?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; not at all; that is under maximum rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has a right to establish a through route. It has a right under the present law to establish a joint rate; that is, to prescribe the maximum rate that both carriers shall charge for the haul on land and water. So much is in the law now. The only change this makes is that for the entire route over both land and water the commission may prescribe a minimum charge.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question there? Suppose in fixing the minimum joint rate for both the rail and water haul the commission should make the minimum rate so high that there would be no inducement to the shipper to use the watercourse.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is exactly what seems to have been done in the New York case. Everybody knows that there are certain advantages which the railroads have, and if the rates by water are made as high as the rates by rail, most people, I am afraid, are going to use the railroads; and there is the danger. If the commission fixes the minimum joint through rate by rail and water so high, the people will not use the water at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not a railway commission, but an interstate commerce commission, whether the commerce be carried by land or water. If the Senate desires to assume that the Interstate Commerce Commission is an enemy of water transportation, is an enemy of the people of the country, and desires to inflict upon them higher rates than are necessary in order to fairly transact the business, then I can see some reason for the position that is assumed here. But I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission is just as much interested in transportation by water as it is in transportation by land. I am bound to believe that it wants to serve all the people of the country in the most effective way in which they can be served. I do not believe that it ought to be asserted, or ought to be believed, that the Interstate Commerce Commission, if it has an opportunity to establish a joint route over a rail-and-water line, is going to establish a minimum rate so high that those who have freight to transport will transport it over an all-rail line if one is available rather than over the rail-and-water line.

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest to the Senator that under the bill it is made just as much the sworn duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to take care of the water carrier as it is to take care of the rail carrier?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is so expressly declared, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] was very glad to have that declaration inserted in the bill. I remember that he said somewhere, whether publicly or not I do not know, that this is the first real recognition that water transportation ever had at the hands of Congress.

Mr. POMERENE. May I add also that in deference to the desire of my good friend, the Senator from Louisiana, we changed the name of the transportation board from railway transportation board to transportation board, so that there would be no distinction between railway transportation and water transportation?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am much obliged for that. You did it at my suggestion and I thank you very much for doing it.

I wish to say to the distinguished chairman of the committee that I would not pretend to intimate that the Interstate Commerce Commission would do anything wrong. I do not believe that they would intentionally do anything wrong, but the chairman of the committee is bound to admit that for a great many years we have had practically no transportation in the country by water on our internal waterways which came into competition with the railways. Just what part the Interstate Commerce Commission had to do with it I am not prepared to say. I am simply stating the fact. The boats have been run off the rivers by the railways when the Interstate Commerce Commission was functioning. So you can not blame the waterway people for being just a little bit chary when it comes to legislating on the subject.

I want again to express my thanks to the committee for declaring that the transportation board shall endeavor in every way possible to keep transportation by water and by rail on terms of parity. I thank them from the bottom of my heart for recognizing for the first time in the history of the country that we have waterways in the country which transport freight. There has been no law to recognize that heretofore of which I know, except some appropriations to improve the waterways. I hope that if the bill is going to be passed, the provisions for the transportation board are going to be kept in it. I can see that there is a danger here, and why incur the danger of keeping in the word minimum? Why not leave the law just as it is? It would certainly be safer.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, just a word further. I share the sympathies of the Senator from Louisiana with water transportation and I want to see it promoted, but I think we have provisions in the bill which will promote it. When the Senator from Louisiana refers to the disadvantages under which water transportation has been operated in the past, permit me to remind him that the Interstate Commerce Commission had no jurisdiction to deal with the water rates at all and in my judgment it was because of that fact largely that the water transportation was put wholly at a disadvantage.

If we are going to encourage both kinds of transportation, and that is what we ought to do, let us trust to the good judgment of the commission that is intrusted with this power. Though there are some things that it has done that I have not agreed with, I think the Interstate Commerce Commission has made a record for itself in the public service which has been equaled by very few other branches of the Governmnet. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator in his commendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, especially in its dealings with the railroads, but I would like to get water transportation before we begin to regulate it, especially on a minimum basis.

We have many objections now—and, I think, very just ones—to appropriations that we are asked to make for the improvement of rivers on the ground that we have no water transportation on them. Whenever a river and harbor bill is up objections are made and the fact is pointed out that we have spent thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars where we have no transportation.

If we are going to fix minimum joint rates that the carriers can charge in connection with railroads, we may, in my judgment, spend all the money that we may appropriate and we will not get the water transportation. When we get the water transportation, then if we find abuses arising I am perfectly willing to try to regulate them.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it may be fairly stated that the Senator himself feels that the amendment which he has presented goes too far. Will he not allow me to make the suggestion at this moment that the amendment be withdrawn and that he submit an amendment which will embrace just what he wants and nothing more? I am not prepared to say that I would support the amendment in that form. My belief is that the section should be adopted as it has been reported by the committee; but if the Senator will pardon me, I would offer that suggestion to him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am very glad to have the suggestion. As I said a while ago, if the committee wants to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix minimum rates on railroads, I do not desire to take that away from them, but, as I understand the section, it really deals with joint rates. That is all that the section is intended to deal with. As the chairman stated a while ago, it simply amounts to a paragraph that deals with joint rates over rail and water lines. I oppose the fixing of minimum joint rates over rail and water lines.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator from Washington if his idea is not to obviate what has been in operation under the law—the fixing of a maximum, but no minimum, and allowing the rates to be put so low as to destroy water competition, but to still give the power to fix a minimum rate on the railroads and then allow the boats that may meet that minimum to adjust their rates to suit themselves?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly; that is it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If we could get an amendment to the bill that would provide for a minimum so far as concerns the rail haul to the point where it comes in contact with water, fixing a minimum so that it could not destroy and drive off water competition, and then allow the water carrier to fix such rates as it sees fit, it would then enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix a rate that would keep alive transportation on the water.

That, it seems to me, would be a fairer chance for water transportation than to allow them to fix a joint minimum rate, because the water rate might be so very much cheaper than the rail rate, and the proportion of the rail haul in length being perhaps equal or greater, that the joint rate, unless the Interstate Commerce Commission were to apportion to each one of the carriers its proportionate share of that rate, might work so that you could hardly have them adjust the rate. Fixing a fair minimum to the water point below which they could not go, and taking the general average and putting it where the water carrier could meet it and meet it profitably, it seems to me, would fill all the requirements at this stage of water development.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any provision in the bill outside of this paragraph allowing the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix minimum rates on railroads?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If there is, that provision will take care of the very proposition the Senator suggests. As I understand it, this paragraph deals only with joint through rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So to strike it out would simply strike out the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix minimum joint through rates——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Leaving the other provision in the bill to take care of the situation the Senator suggests. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it possible that the Senator has in mind that the Interstate Commerce Commission would discriminate against one carrier and in favor of another carrier when its business is to regulate both in the interest of the public?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I am not saying this because I think the section should be stricken out. I think it should remain in the bill, but in answering the inquiry made by the Senator from Washington I had in mind section 44, on page 85, of the bill, where it is stated that—> the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or rates, fares, or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case, or the maximum, or minimum, or maximum and minimum, to be charged, and what individual or joint classification—

And so forth.

I think that gives the commission the right to prescribe a minimum individual rate, the word "individual" being used in contradistinction to the word "joint."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have here a memorandum from a gentleman in whom I have great confidence, in which he states that in the testimony of Commissioner Clark before the House committee he indicated very clearly his belief that they should take care of the railroads and the railroad situation. I do not know whether that is correct or not; but, at any rate, I do not see why we should now place it in the power of any governmental body to destroy water transportation; for we put it in their power to do so in certain cases when we give this power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I should hope they would not exercise it; I should hope they would not use it in that way; but why give them that power? We want water transportation and we want water carriers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me at that point, the very section which the chairman of the committee read from provides—the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or rates, fares, or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case, or the maximum, or minimum, or maximum and minimum, to be charged, and what individual or joint classification, regulation, or practice is or will be just, fair, and reasonable, to be thereafter followed, and to make an order that the carrier or carriers shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the commission finds that the same does or will exist.

In other words, that is almost a repetition of that of which the Senator complains, because there the commission is given a right to fix a minimum and maximum joint or individual rate, which must be observed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That also might need to be amended; but section 41 deals especially with paragraph (b) of section 6 of the interstate-commerce act, which expressly gives the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to fix maximum rates for the joint rail-and-water haul. Section 41 extends that and gives them the power to fix minimum rates.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then, section 44 is still a further enlargement of section 41?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It may be; but let us strike out section 41, and then, if we have to strike out the other provision in section 44, very well. I had supposed that section 41 covered the whole matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Washington will not destroy the entire interstate-commerce act.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not want to do that, I am sure; but the Senator from South Carolina just called the other section to my attention. I did not know what that section accomplished. I had not examined that phase of it at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. That does not relate to water carriage at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, I would not desire to touch it.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is most unfortunate, in my opinion, Mr. President, that in formulating a bill it is given the appearance of antagonism between the rail lines and the water lines. That is the most unfortunate thing that could possibly creep into this discussion. It would be especially unfortunate if it were to find a place in the law. Water carriers and land carriers are bound to cooperate if water carriers are successful.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, on page 58, it is proposed to strike out the words "each railway craft" and insert in lieu thereof "all classified employees of the railway carriers without other distinction"; and in lines 21 and 22, on said page, to strike out the word "crafts" and insert in lieu thereof the words "classified employees."

Mr. STERLING. I offer the amendment, Mr. President, partly in the interest of certainty in the portion of the bill affected and partly for the sake of preventing any discrimination between employees. The term "craft" may mean—indeed, that is one meaning given to it in the dictionaries—a trade-union or guild; and if the matter of selection is confined to the railway crafts, the language will most likely be so interpreted that employees outside of unions will have no voice whatever in the nomination of the committee of wages and working conditions. The law should not be left in such shape that a man in order that he might have his rights in this respect would feel it incumbent upon him to become a member of a trade-union; he should be left entirely free in that respect. I think the term "railway chaft" is used nowhere else in the bill than on this page. So I propose to substitute in place of "railway craft" the term "classified employees." In doing that I make this part of the bill coincide with other parts of the bill where the term "classified employees" is used and where the classified employees, apparently without other distinction, are the ones who participate in the election of the directors of companies incorporated under the act and of the directors of new corporations which are formed under the act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is the meaning of the words "classified employees" exactly clear? The reason I make the inquiry is that several persons have spoken to me, one a railroad man, who were not quite sure what meaning was to be ascribed under this bill to the words "classified employees." I ask the Senator from South Dakota or the chairman of the committee exactly what those words mean?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am informed, Mr. President, that both in the Railroad Administration and the Interstate Commerce Commission the phrase "classified employees" has a distinct and definite meaning. It was in view of that information coming to me quite recently that we adopted an amendment a few days ago providing for a board of adjustment for subordinate officials. It was because they were not, according to the terminology of these two administrative bodies, within the term "classified employees." I think the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota distinctly improves the bill, and expresses exactly what we intended to express.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I now submit another amendment, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 16, after the word "offices," it is proposed to strike out the period and add the following:

Provided, That all classified employees, without other distinction, shall have the right and opportunity, through proper notice, to participate in such nominations.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer this amendment partly on the same ground that I offered the previous amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with the spirit of the amendment I have no objection at all. My thought at this moment is how would the unorganized classified employees present their nominee or nominees?

Mr. STERLING. I can not say, Mr. President, how they would do that. The language is confined to "classified employees," and in its broad sense it would mean all, whether organized or unorganized. Surely the unorganized employees ought to have the right to participate in the nominations, and some method ought to be provided whereby the classified employees would receive notice——

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. STERLING. So that they might have the opportunity of participating in the nominations.

Mr. CUMMINS. The broad spirit of the amendment appeals to me so strongly that I shall make no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry as to the scope of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin last evening, which was adopted, I think, today during my temporary absence from the Chamber. I refer to an amendment, on page 28, where a certain part of the section was stricken out.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may answer the question, to save time, referring to the record, the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which was adopted, struck out, in line 23, beginning with the word "if," the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 14 on page 29.

Mr. STERLING. That being the case, I offer an amendment to be added after the word "reasonable," in line 23, page 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, line 23, after the word "reasonable," it is proposed to insert:

If, in the exercise of the power in this paragraph contained, the terms fixed by said board have not been complied with, the carrier from or to whose lines such traffic has been diverted shall be entitled to recover, by suit or action against the other carrier, any damages it may have sustained by reason of the failure of such other carrier to comply with such terms.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the amendment. I think it would be true anyhow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "such requirement or with," so as to make it read "is not satisfied with the terms fixed for such use."

Mr. STERLING. I move to strike out those words, Mr. President, for the simple reason that I do not think a railway carrier, on simply being not satisfied with the requirements imposed by the transportation board, should have the right to bring an action. The fact that a carrier is not satisfied should not be the foundation for an action. I therefore propose to strike out the words indicated. As the language of the bill now stands, simply on an expression of dissatisfaction with the requirements laid down by the board with regard to terminal facilities, the carrier would have a right to bring an action. If the amendment is adopted, the language of the bill will give the carrier the right of action if "not satisfied with the terms fixed for such use" or if the amount of compensation which is fixed is not duly and promptly paid. The carrier will have a right of action on those grounds, but not simply because he is not satisfied with the requirement that is made by the board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, on page 78 of one of the numerous editions of the bill, I call attention to that paragraph of section 34 which reads:

> From and after January 1, 1920, no carrier by railroad subject to this act shall undertake the extension of its line of railroad, or the construction of a new line of railroad.

And so forth. In the copy of the bill that I have the provision beginning with line 14, on page 78, including all of page 79, and going down to line 13 on page 80, deals with that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 34, on page 73, beginning with line 14, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 12 on page 75.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I call attention to that paragraph of section 34 which reads:

> From and after January 1, 1920, no carrier by railroad subject to this act shall undertake the extension of its line of railroad, or the construction of a new line of railroad—

And so forth.

In the copy of the bill that I have, the provision beginning with line 14, on page 78, including all of page 79, and going down to line 13, on page 80, deals with that subject. Mr. President, I move to strike out that provision, for the reason that I think we are all agreed that we are now suffering more from an inadequacy of rail transportation facilities than from any other cause. I have here before me the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission last issued. It is a startling revelation to see what scant additions in rolling stock and equipment have been provided in the last 10 years.

The present proposed railroad legislation is predicated upon a more or less standardized condition of our country; that is, those roads that have already an established position, and that have more or less established themselves in the communities, are the ones for which we are legislating. On account of the history of the advent and development of the railroads in this country this legislation has grown up. I believe it was as late as 1886 before there was any serious idea in the minds of the American people that any other than the sovereign States had a right to regulate commerce. A decision of the Supreme Court about that time exploded the old theory, and decided that the regulation of rail transportation was a Federal function and not a State function. Then, a little later, a law was passed to meet that situation, and the Interstate Commerce Commission was established.

So radical in its revolutionary nature was the application of steam to transportation that there was a perfect orgy of graft, not alone on the part of the companies who were promoting these systems of transportation, but by the public itself; for, realizing the vast wealth-producing power of this new system, by all kinds of subsidies and land grants, every inducement that could be brought to bear upon capital was brought to bear, in order that the various communities might enjoy this developing and civilizing agency that had come into existence. No one questioned at that time the means and methods by which a railroad was brought into a community. The great desideratum was, get the railroad into the community.

There is not a man who is conversant with railroad development but that knows that the development of America, the marvelous development of this new country, was made possible by the happy conjunction of circumstances by which, comparatively, soon after the establishment of this Government the application of steam to transportation was made practicable. The fact of the business is that the very first road that was ever built for steam transportation alone was built in this country. Certain sections of the Northeast and the East, as compared with other parts of the country, are standardized and developed. I take it that the object of this committee and the object of the American people is to encourage railroad building, to encourage the development and extension of railroad facilities in those sections not yet adequately provided for. What has caused the attitude of the public mind in reference to railroad legislation is the excesses that have been practiced by those who did not recognize the dependence of organized society upon this form of carriage.

We ourselves, as legislators, have been responsible in part for the cessation of railroad building in this country. Our legislation was a virtue carried to the point of a vice, because the evils that had sprung up were so glaring that in our restrictive laws we did not take the time to consider what was the root of the evil and apply the remedy there. We attemped to arrest the effect of the evil. Hence we had our restrictive laws as to rates, fares, and charges; we had our restrictive laws as to competition.

Up to the advent of the railroads in our commercial and industrial life one of the axioms of business was that competition was the life of trade. The railroads demonstrated the fact that competition could be converted into the death of commerce, and proceeded to do it. By actual competition strong railroads of unlimited resources would put their freight and passenger rates down to a point where a weaker competitor would be destroyed. They would meet him by actual competition, at a loss to themselves, until he was destroyed, and then absorb the competitor, and by raising rates recoup out of the public the loss that they had sustained in killing the competitor.

That orgy went on. In fact, the very instrumentalities of commerce were made the dice on the gaming table. As some one put it, they were the poker chips in the poker game. All kinds of excesses grew up—pooling of interests, destruction of competitors, recking not what effects they were having upon those who depended upon this means of transportation to carry on the commerce of the country; and we, in legislating to remedy the evil, actually precipitated, so far as the public was concerned, a condition about as bad as the roads themselves had created. We said to the railroads, "Those of you that lie in contiguous territory, or in a certain tariff zone, may not absorb or compete in rates with a paralleling line. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix a uniform rate, and that uniform rate shall apply to the roads in that district." You had the misnomer of competition in service, as contradistinguished from competition in rates, and what was the result? The result was that a railroad which had been later built, and perhaps cost more, which for one reason or another could not carry the tonnage that its competitor carried, could not live under a given rate, while its competitor was making enormous profits as compared with the capital invested.

When this war broke out there was disclosed another evil that had grown up under our restrictive laws, namely, that the great, strong through lines in this country could divert their traffic to their friends to the absolute starvation and destruction of other roads that emanated from the same terminal.

So notorious was that that all of the traffic that originated in the Mississippi Valley, in the West and the Northwest and South, was diverted to the North Atlantic ports; so that when this war broke out the established lines of traffic leading to these ports were the neck of a bottle so congested that you could not get your loaded cars in nor your empty ones out. There had been no opening up of the different ports, there had been no proper distribution of traffic from these sections to the Gulf and South Atlantic and Middle Atlantic ports.

This condition arose from the selfish interests of those who owned the great trunk lines. They routed the freight where they saw fit outside of the fortuitous routing of individuals. These conditions are what have brought about the attitude of the public toward the railroads.

I take it that what we are driving at, and all we hope to accomplish now, is to see to it that the capital invested for carrier services shall be a bona fide investment for the purposes of transportation and to divest the carrier of the power to divert business to another carrier, to the destruction of a competing carrier, which carrier is as necessary to the community through which it runs as the stronger line is. It is proper to take away from the owners of this property the right beyond their terminus to determine over what route the freight that they have brought to that terminus shall go, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to route it according to the public interest. In addition to that, restrict the capital invested in a given railroad corporation to that corporation, and see that that corporation shall discharge the function of a carrier, with the capital that it has invested, and not be allowed interlocking directorates and the pooling of their interests ad libitum. Restrict them to their corporation or, as this bill provides, where there is, in the public interest, a pooling, let it be under the supervision of and by the direction and authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I state here and now that had we recognized at the beginning that the investments in railroad property and the subsequent issue of securities against that property should be scrutinized by an impartial tribunal, an official body, we would never have had the disgraceful operation of our railroads that has occurred. But in attempting to cure the evil that has grown up under this ungoverned and unchecked issuance of securities against a given property there is provided in this bill a paragraph, a part of a section, that forbids any community from building a railroad or extending an old line unless they get permission from the board of transportation.

In the undeveloped West and in the South, where it is a case of arrested development, there is vast territory that needs to be developed. Who is the better judge of whether a new road would enhance the value and meet the needs of the community, the people on the ground who are suffering for the lack of it, and whose judgment is to be taken on the premises, or a political board composed of two of one political party and three of another? The fact is that this bill provides that where there is an application for the construction of a new road there shall be contiguous to the line of construction sufficient development to guarantee a tonnage that would guarantee a return for its construction. We must not forget the fact that a railroad is par excellence a developer. Take the history of our great continental lines. They ran through a territory comprising thousands of miles on which there was not a single unit that would produce freight or passengers to pay for the construction thereof.

But once this artery was built and the facility for getting the traffic out, both as to persons and property, was afforded, the development of the trackless territory was nothing less than a miracle brought about by this country assuming the overhead charges, absolutely carrying the stocks and bonds without a cent of return until such time as the people, taking advantage of this facility of transportation and travel, went into that rich country and developed it. Those conditions are not extinct in this country. Those conditions still exist in the West and in parts of the South. I consider it one of the virtues of this bill that the securities proposed to be issued for the purpose of constructing a road shall be under the supervision of a Federal body. But the building of the road should be left with the community.

I do not think it is fair to ask any of the undeveloped sections of this country to come before a board here in Washington and put their case before them, and depend upon them to decide whether or not their local community may be developed.

I understand that there has been criticism in reference to certain roads that have been built unnecessarily in this country. To all rules there is an exception. There may be a few such roads, but their percentage is infinitesimal by the side of those that have been built by private enterprise, with local charters, that have been of incalculable benefit. These are the ones that constitute to-day the great trunk lines of this country. The connecting up of the small lines that have been built for the development of the local communities has produced the great transportation systems of this country.

This bill proposes that all construction, both as to the extension of old lines and the building of new lines, shall be at the behest, at the sufferance of a transportation board in Washington. If we were a standardized country, if we had practically a sufficient amount of railroads in this country, a sufficient mileage, ramifying the country and meeting the needs of the vast majority of the outlying territory, it might be very well then for us to pass restrictive legislation looking toward preventing the still further burdening of the public with unnecessary railroads. But what we need at this time is more railroads; to provide the machinery for their proper supervision as to the issuance of securities and the overcharging of rates and fares, but not to discourage the building of railroads.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator concede that under the group-rate plan provided for in this bill the building of unnecessary lines and competing lines would result in an increase of rates for all the shippers within the territory comprising the group?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I had thought of that very thing, and I think an amendment should be offered to this bill granting to new lines during their period of development certain privileges that would not affect that grouping. If you do not do that, as the Senator from Wisconsin intimates, the passage of this bill means the stopping of railroad construction in this country; because when you have given a certain group of roads a monopoly of territory, they will say to the farmers and the merchants and business men of that territory, "This is our territory. We are grouped here, and given a specific monopoly of this territory, therefore haul your stuff 10 or 15 miles across country, for if it finds a market it has to go over our roads, and why should we build more to accommodate you when we have a monopoly of the territory?"

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], as well as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], if the argument which the Senator from South Carolina is making is not a very strong argument against the group rating system, and if it does not show the vice of one of the fundamental principles of this bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I do know that whenever we force, by compulsory consolidation, these roads into certain groups, so far as any further railroad construction in this country comes, it will have to come when absolute necessity or greed forces the group to build the road.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. This bill provides that the earnings over a given amount—5½ or 6 per cent—shall be distributed among the weaker roads. If the board having charge of the railroad that is established should conclude that the building of new roads might tend to the diversion of this excess from the roads that are already located in the standardized community, might that not be a powerful deterrent to the building of new roads in entirely new country?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As a matter of course, I do not think that there will be any very great amount of reserve gotten from the excess over the 6 per cent provided. I think the railroads are old enough in the business to see to it that they do not perform a service gratuitously for others; and they will so regulate their business, possibly, so as to get the 6 per cent, but not do four or five times the work to get a quarter of 1 per cent on the balance that they may earn.

It seems to me, to restate the proposition as I stated it at the beginning of my remarks, that if the object of this legislation and if, as I take it, the need of this country is for more and better railroad facilities, surely we can leave to the initiative of the American citizens in undeveloped territory the right to assume the debt and responsibility of constructing any road with this board of transportation scrutinizing the securities, scrutinizing the investment, and assuring the public that the money was properly spent in constructing this common carrier, and then allow that road to work out its own destiny.

I think it far better for us to strike this provision out and leave it to the community to determine whether or not in their judgment that new roads are needed. Every Senator here knows that in most of the States the communities assume the overhead charges, not looking so much for any return from the railroad as the enhancement of the value of the property through which it runs.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator from South Carolina seems to think that these powerful corporations, wise in business, would find it impracticable, if not impossible, to earn more than the minimum permitted under which they absorb all their earnings.

Does the Senator believe that if that sort of a rule were applied, not to soulless corporations, but to individuals, it would work otherwise? Suppose there should be passed an act by the State of South Carolina providing that the farmers who were located in rich valley land, applying loam, should turn over all they made over 10 per cent, clear, to a reserve fund, to be used in the manuring and improving of the poorer lands. Do you think that the poor farmer of South Carolina would get rich under that sort of a system?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not think he would. I think he would come nearer going ahead and producing the crop than the railroad would come to going ahead and performing the services for which they knew they might get less than one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. President, I know this provision was written in the bill for the purpose of keeping the public from being burdened with unnecessary roads and unnecessary expense. Yet that is a matter for the community to determine. I am perfectly willing to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to control the issue of securities, in so far as they are honest or dishonest, and have them restrict the use of them to the corporation that issues them and for the legitimate purposes of transportation. But when it comes to the question of whether or not my community shall be developed at the behest of a Federal board, I think the sovereignty of the States and the communities and the individuals yet should have some place. I do not believe it is right for us to put it in the power of a board of transportation to say to an undeveloped community, "For miles and miles you may haul your stuff as best you can to our road. We are guaranteed so much here, we will get so much we have a monopoly, why should we go to the extra expense of building another road? We will handle the stuff anyway."

Therefore the passage of the bill in the form in which it now is means the stoppage of any further railroad construction, certainly voluntary railroad construction.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the bill provide—I have not analyzed it sufficiently carefully to know—any control or discretion in roads that are expected to provide a reserve fund over the building of terminal facilities and improvements of their property?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; that is entirely within the board. The board is charged with that power. In all extensions and in all building of new roads they are given full power to decide whether or not it shall be done.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand, the bill does not control the discretion of the roads in the improvement of terminal facilities and improvements of that kind on the lines already builded. It determines that discretion in the building of new roads.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; and extensions.

Mr. STANLEY. If you have that, have you not got the rat hole into which all the water will run?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Even if that were not so, everyone knows that human nature is what it is. The personnel of the board largely determines where the railroad construction will go in the country. The board consists of five members, a political body, and upon the political caste of that body will rest the determination in a large degree of the railroad construction that will go on in the country and where it will go. I submit that it is not right to put into the hands of any man the power to destroy or arrest the development of one section of the country and to determine what section shall be developed.

Therefore I move that the paragraph to which I refer be stricken from the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, may I inquire if his motion contemplates the striking out of the provision that prevents the abandonment of any part of the road by any common carrier without obtaining the consent of the board of transportation? If the Senator will permit me to ask another question before he answers that, if it does contemplate that I would like to ask the Senator to explain by what power or process of authority the board of transportation will carry into execution that provision of the statute? What authority has the board, with reference to the North Carolina or South Carolina railroad company, that may have a road running through a portion of the Senator's State for a hundred miles or so and which is not profitable, which is a losing concern, to compel the owners of the road to maintain it for an indefinite period? Are there pains and penalties prescribed to enforce the mandate? Is it a penal provision or is it by the injunctive power of the courts that the owners of the road are to be compelled to operate the road whether they want to or not, whether it is profitable or not, or whether it serves any useful purpose?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It goes without saying that a road once constructed would not be abandoned by the company that constructed it without there being absolute compelling reasons, and I do not fear anything along that line. I think most of the States provide against the abandonment of a road. I think that the company could be enjoined from abandoning it unless they could show a sufficient cause, once they had secured the charter and franchise necessary to operate. I think the charter and franchise would provide against them wantonly tearing up and destroying their road.

That is a matter, of course, that would be provided for and is provided for in most of the States, and properly so; but that is infinitesimal compared to the proposition of restricting all future railroad development to the say so of the board of transportation. I know it is provided in the bill that committees may be heard and the cause set forth, and for that very reason I object to it. We know that whenever you come to Washington, as long as roads are in private control, and lay your plans and your purpose before the board and they are published, those who are in the business that do not want you to enter the competitive field will see to it that monkey wrenches are thrown into the machinery. For that very reason it invites a disturbance in the construction of roads.

I do not think it would impair the bill one iota; I think it would help it; I think the bill would be in better shape if we trusted the wisdom and patriotism of the American people in the matter of constructing the roads and then providing against the Shylocks and the money lenders from destroying them after they are built. I think we can safely leave that to the American people.

Therefore I propose that that part of section 34 comprised in the paragraph to which I have alluded be stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The SECRETARY. On page 73 of the old print, line 14, section 34, strike out all down to and including the words "in the discretion of the court," in line 12 on page 75.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, everyone familiar at all with the subject will understand, I am sure, that the provision sought to be stricken out by the Senator from South Carolina is a new departure in the policy of regulating commerce among the States. I do not remember just how many States have legislation of this character, but there is a very considerable number of the States which for the protection of their people and the better regulation of their commerce have adopted provisions substantially like the one now sought to be eliminated from the bill.

It presents to the country a question which ought to be considered and ought to be decided without passion or prejudice, and ought to be decided without respect to the effect which it is supposed it would have upon any particular part of the United States. If there is any one thing from which the transportation system of the country, taken as a whole, is now suffering, it is from the unguided, uncontrolled right of owners to build railroads wherever they may see fit to build them and whenever they can avail themselves of an opportunity to sell at a profit the securities based upon the supposed construction.

The railways of the United States are not built where they should have been built. Everybody understands that. A great many have been built that never should have been constructed. We are now under the disadvantage of having developed a system which must be maintained because communities have been built up along the railways, and their interests can not be disregarded in the regulations which we shall adopt. The whole trouble to which I referred in my opening statement has arisen because of the building of railways simply to make money out of their construction and without regard to the possible profit of their operation.

I believe myself that the era of speculation in railroad building has passed. I believe that the development of the future must be along the line of safe and reasonable investment rather than of speculation. In the old days it was easy enough to secure a corps of engineers and survey a railway route almost anywhere; it was easy to organize a company for the purpose of constructing a railroad; and then it was comparatively easy to take the fifteen, twenty, or thirty thousand dollars of bonds per mile issued upon the property and the twenty, thirty-five, or forty-five thousand dollars of stock issued upon the same property by the same company and go into the markets with those securities and dispose of them at some price—at a price that usually gave to the promoters a very great profit. That is the way in which many of the fortunes which have been accumulated through railway manipulation have been founded, and they are the objects which are always pointed to in order to bring down reproach upon those who seek to grant to railway companies a revenue which will fairly support the existing systems.

I believe that there will be more railways built in the future where they should be built. I believe the securities will be better investments if the public authority exercises some supervision over the location and construction of the roads. I have long held this view, and, while I am not the author of this part of the bill, I very heartily agree to its policy in that respect.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, he spoke of railroads being built purely for speculative purposes. That was true in the early history of railroad development; but the Senator does not think it is very probable, in view of the fact that hereafter railroad securities are to be scrutinized in the manner provided by this bill, that communities themselves will become the victims of promoters in the light of past experience and the history of railroad construction, or that they would be likely to foster such enterprises merely for speculative purposes, as they have done in the past, especially under the restrictive features in this bill in reference to securities. That being true, does not the Senator think communities themselves would be more disposed now to invest their money in railway improvements which they themselves know to be needed? If they know that the issuance of securities is supervised by competent authority, either in the State or the Nation—and the bill provides that the supervision shall be Federal—will they not be more ready to invest, knowing they are not likely to meet the fate of those who took promoters' stock in the days that have gone by?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will say very frankly that I do not believe that the experience of the past will be duplicated in the future. I think that it will be found very much more difficult to dispose of railway securities in the future than it has been in the past. I think any sane man will readily agree to that conclusion; but, nevertheless, Mr. President, the opportunity still remains.

I have no doubt whatever that there ought to be railway building in the future. I have no doubt there are regions of this country which will need railway facilities which do not now have them; but it must not be assumed that because a project must be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to any Government authority, therefore there will be no railroad building in the future. What possible reason would the Government of the United States have to forbid or refuse to authorize a legitimate extension of railways?

We are, I hope, patriotic. I do not agree that the Government of the United States is in control of the existing railways.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, we are here trying to pass a bill to curb the greed and lack of patriotism of those who have built our railroads, or at least of those who own them. That is what we are doing in this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; and I think we will do it successfully. We have done it with fair success in the past, and I think we can do it in the future. I am not one of those who feel that every time an extension of governmental authority is asked it will necessarily be abused. I am not in favor of extending the authority of the Government except in those cases in which it is fairly necessary to protect the people of the United States; but where it is necessary I am not reluctant about doing it because I fear that the Government is going to be controlled by selfish men. I have faith in the Government of this country, even though I do not always agree with what it does. I think in the main that those in whom we have reposed authority have exercised it with fidelity and with the interests of the people in view. I think they will do so in this instance. There are a thousand cases in which we must give some such authority to the Government if the people are to be protected, for they can not be protected after the evil is accomplished. I do not believe, therefore, in the theory of the Senator from South Carolina that, if the people of his State, desiring to build a railroad, should come to Washington and lay the venture before the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission would deny the authority because the interest of some existing railroad might be served by refusing the authority; I can not conceive of that happening.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the instance I am about to relate is not a parallel case, but it is analogous, and the chairman of the committee which in part would have the matter in charge is present. There happens to be a section of my State in which there are two rivers about 23 miles apart. The people on the upper reaches of the longer river desire to have entrance into two ports—Charleston and Georgetown. By cutting a canal from one river into the other, a distance, as I have said, of 23 miles, they would be given water transportation to the interior of the State. A company was organized in my State which proposed to cut such a canal. In the distance between the two rivers there is incidentally a fall of about 40 feet. The idea was conceived that when the canal was constructed locks and dams could be put in to develop water power of about 15,000 horsepower.

It was stipulated that there should be no tolls charged through the locks; that the improvement should not cost the Government a penny; and it was understood that the electricity generated and transmitted from the canal to the navy yard at Charleston would save the Government perhaps something like $75,000 or $100,000 a year, and would relieve also the consumption of coal by furnishing the street car companies with electricity. Those interested in the project simply asked the privilege of building the canal and constructing a dam for water power.

The improvement would have added immeasurably to the commerce of my State and would have developed power for the benefit of the public; yet what was the result? Under the rules and regulations established in Washington it was impossible for those interested to carry that improvement through, because, although local in character, it touched, in the first instance, a navigable stream and in the next instance had to wait upon the passage of a water-power bill. The people of Charleston must still burn coal, and the people of the upper regions of the river must still do without port facilities simply because, so far as the permission is concerned, it is a Federal affair and not a local affair. The consequence is that the canal has not been dug and perhaps it is not going to be dug, and the people down there will be compelled to continue to consume coal.

Mr. THOMAS. They will be lucky if they can get coal.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As the Senator from Colorado says, they will be lucky if they can get coal. This is but one instance; but it serves to illustrate the result of the interference by the Federal Government in the legitimate development of this country. I imagine Senators from the West could testify here as to the result of Government interference with certain lands and certain power and with the wealth that lies out there under the control of the Federal Government, which might otherwise be developed and used.

I merely cite the case of the canal which it was proposed to dig as an analogous case to our coming to Washington, and asking if we could construct a railroad to take care of a certain situation that imperatively needed relief. The reply might be, "Oh, yes; come and lay the case before us." So we might lay the case before them, but some other community might be exhausting all the reserve funds and very likely might need more, and those who do not feel the pinch of the shoe can very easily say "no." That is what would happen.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not be for the other community to say "no" in the case put by the Senator from South Carolina. Assuming that he states the facts correctly—and I have no doubt he does—I can see no reason for a refusal to enter into the agreement which he suggests if any officer of the Government had any authority to enter into such an agreement, but unfortunately there is no officer or department of the Government with authority to enter into an agreement of that character unless the necessary legislation is passed.

I express no opinion as to the merits of the water-power bill at this time; I have had occasion to discuss that measure frequently; but the difficulty with the project to which the Senator referred is evidently the want of legislation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But, Mr. President, right at that point, the mere possibility of the legislation being enacted is what is arresting that development. I think so far as digging the canal is concerned I might get that by, and so far as constructing the docks is concerned, but the parties will not risk investing their money in an absolutely feasible scheme, and one that is indicated as a necessity, not knowing just what form the legislation will take as to incidental power developed by virtue of building a canal. Therefore until we do know whether or not some power here will say, "You can" or "You can not," the development of that community is denied.

Mr. CUMMINS. Still, Mr. President, I suggest that the difficulty lies in the want of legislation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In the threat of legislation. Here you have the positive thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator says that he wants a contract that the power produced in the navigable streams can be used in private enterprise. That is one of the great questions involved in the water-power development of the country; and it is a legislative question, not an executive or an administrative question.

There is no parallel between the case put by the Senator from South Carolina and this one. We propose here to grant to a governmental body the right to survey the situation, and then say, as to a railroad which is to be a common carrier and to be engaged in interstate commerce, whether under the circumstances, looking at the future of the community and the opportunities for traffic and everything of that sort, it is a fair and a reasonable venture upon which the people of the country will be called upon eventually to pay a return.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No, Mr. President; the analogy to which I called attention was this: If there were no pending legislation, if there were no danger of any legislation interfering with the enjoyment of the power that they would create by digging the canal, then those people would have it dug now and the community would be enjoying the benefits from it; but in view of the pendency of the legislation they are denied that privilege. Here actual legislation is proposed to the effect that before you do it you have got to come and ask permission of an authority that knows nothing about the matter, except as it may hear both sides of perhaps a prejudiced case and it is not left to the community alone.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very familiar with the case the Senator from South Carolina states, and I feel very clear that if there never had been a water-power bill introduced in either House of Congress, before they could build that canal and create that water power they would have to have legislation from Congress.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think, so far as granting the right to divert the water from one river into another is concerned, that would necessarily have to have the O. K. of Congress, but the engineers have already passed upon that feature of it. In the case of the incidental power that is to be generated, however, there is no legislation for it; and yet, as to the canal, the law that grants to the Federal Government the right to control navigable streams having been complied with, this other benefit, because of the pendency of legislation or the danger of it, is denied the community.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think it is quite fair to test the merit of the propositions contained in this bill by reference to some of the imperfections of government. This is a plain, easily understood proposition as to whether the construction of railroads which will carry interstate commerce for the future, and which must be supported by the imposition of rates which will return a fair interest upon the investment or value of the property, shall be placed under public control. That is the plain, easily understood proposition. I think every Senator has thought sufficiently about the matter and is sufficiently acquainted not only with the legislation of his own State but with the policy of the country generally to record an intelligent judgment upon the proposal; and I am quite willing to take a vote upon it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. The bill says:

> From and after January 1, 1920, no carrier by railroad subject to this act shall undertake the extension of its line of railroad, or the construction of a new line of railroad—

And so forth. Take a case like this: Suppose the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., which extends through my State, should desire to build a road between two points in my State, but not connecting with its main line, could it do that without getting a permit under this act?

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends entirely on whether or not it desires to do an interstate business. This does not relate at all to a railroad that is willing to content itself with purely intrastate traffic; but if the road carried commerce between the States, then I think it would be compelled to apply to the commission under this section.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought that was true, and yet I wondered whether there was any doubt about it under the language of this section. It says, "or the construction of a new line of railroad." It does not say "a new line of interstate railroad," but "a new line of railroad."

Mr. CUMMINS. But it begins by saying, "No carrier by railroad subject to this act."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are no railroads subject to this act except those engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know; but I say, the Northern Pacific, of course, is subject to this act.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is correct.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, suppose that the Northern Pacific, as now organized and existing, wants to build a railroad between two points in my State, but not connected with its present line.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or with any line?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Or with any line, for that matter—just connecting between two points.

Mr. CUMMINS. And not doing interstate business?

Mr. JONES of Washington. And not doing interstate business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it would have to apply, because the Federal Government has no jurisdiction over a purely intrastate instrumentality.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is true; but it seemed to me that this language might bear the construction that you wanted to give the jurisdiction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course I can not conceive of any railroad for general transportation that does not carry traffic destined beyond the borders of the State in which it may exist.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; I agree with the Senator. My question was simply based upon the language here, and I wanted to get the Senator's construction of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCORMICK in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I think this matter is of sufficient importance to have a quorum here. I do not want to suggest the absence of a quorum, and I therefore suggest that the amendment might go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment temporarily and reintroduce it to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, any Senator has the right to call for a quorum. Does the Senator from South Carolina suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DIAL. No.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will withdraw the amendment and reintroduce it to-morrow.

Mr. DIAL. I want to have us make all the progress we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I withdraw it temporarily.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in the early discussion of this bill the Senator in charge of it referred to section 45. That is a provision with reference to through rates over railroad and water lines, and is of especial interest to water lines in foreign trade. With the purpose of that amendment I am in hearty accord. I am in hearty accord with what the Senator from Iowa seeks to do in that amendment and I should like to see legislation on the subject as soon as possible. I hardly think, however, that the section as framed is in the shape that it really ought to be, and I am going to take the liberty, after conferring with the Senator, of offering a substitute for it, so that when it goes to conference the whole matter, of course, will be in conference, and the Senator will have before him this suggestion and these ideas. He knows what section 45 is as it is now, and I feel that some satisfactory provision can be worked out.

I therefore offer a substitute for section 45, in the hope that it will furnish the basis for a satisfactory section in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 45, as printed in the bill, it is proposed to insert the following:

> SEC. 45. Every common carrier by water in foreign commerce, whose vessels are registered under the laws of the United States and thereby made subject to regulation under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, shall file with the board within 30 days after this act takes effect and regularly thereafter, a schedule or schedules showing each of its steam vessels intended to load general cargo at ports in the United States for foreign destinations; the ports of loading; the dates upon which vessels will commence to receive freight and dates of sailing; the route and itinerary vessel will follow and the ports of call for which cargo will be carried, and upon application of any shipper the carrier by railroad shall make request for, and the carrier by water shall upon receipt of such request name, a specific rate applying for such sailing and upon such commodity as shall be embraced in the inquiry, and shall name in connection with such rate port charges, if any, which accrue in addition to the vessel's rates and are not otherwise published by the railway as in addition to or absorbed in the railway rate. Vessel rates, if conditioned upon quantity of shipment, must be so stated and separate rate may be provided for carload and less-than-carload shipments. The carrier by water, upon advices from a carrier by railroad, stating that the quoted rate is firmly accepted as applying upon a specifically named quantity of any commodity, shall make firm reservation from unsold space in such steam vessel as shall be required for its transportation and shall so advise the carrier by railroad, in which advices shall be included the latest available information as to prospective sailing date of said steamer.
> As the matters so required to be stated in such schedule or schedules are changed or modified from time to time, the carrier shall file with the board such changes or modifications as early as practicable after such modification is ascertained. The board is authorized to make and publish regulations not inconsistent herewith governing the manner and form in which such carriers are to comply with the foregoing provisions.
> The board shall cause to be published in compact form, for the information of shippers of commodities throughout the country, the substance of such schedules, and furnish such publications to all railway carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, in such quantities so that railway carriers may supply to each of their agents who receive commodities for shipment in such cities and towns as may be specified by the board, a copy of said publication; the intent being that each shipping community sufficiently important, from the standpoint of the export trade, to be so specified by the board shall have opportunity to know the sailings and routes and to ascertain the transportation charges of vessels engaged in foreign commerce as aforesaid. Each railway carrier to which such publication is furnished by the board is hereby required to distribute the same as aforesaid and to maintain such publication as it is issued from time to time, in the hands of its said agents. The board is authorized to make such rules and regulations respecting the distribution and maintenance of said publications in the several communities so specified not inconsistent herewith and which will further the intent of this section.

When any consignor delivers a shipment of property to any of the places specified by the board as aforesaid, to be delivered by the railway carrier to one of the vessels upon which space has been reserved at a specified rate previously ascertained, as provided herein, for the transportation by water from and for a port named in the aforesaid schedule, the railway carrier shall issue a through bill of lading to the point of destination; such bill of lading shall name separately the charge to be paid for the railway transportation, water transportation, and port charges, if any, not included in the rail or water transportation charge; but the carrier by railroad shall not be liable to the consignor, consignee, or other person interested in the shipment after its delivery to the vessel; and the board shall make such rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith as will prescribe, in such manner as shall preserve for the carrier by water the protection of limited liability provided by law, the form of the through bill of lading thus to be issued. In all such cases it shall be the duty of the carrier by railroad to deliver such shipment to the vessel as a part of its undertaking as a common carrier.

The issuance of a through bill of lading covering shipments as provided for herein shall not be held to constitute "an arrangement for continuous carriage or shipment" within the meaning of the act to regulate commerce, as amended, nor shall any vessel registered under the laws of the United States be held subject to any of the provisions of said act when operating upon routes on which they are in competition with vessels of foreign nations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I realize that the provisions of the bill upon the subject covered by the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] must be worked out in conference. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington offers just as fair a basis for that work as the provision now in the bill, and I do not intend to offer any resistance to the acceptance of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I tried to follow the reading of the amendment, but it is very lengthy. So far as I know, it may be all right. But it does seem to me that this is not the way to legislate. I ask the Senator from Washington whether this has been submitted to the committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. This amendment practically embodies section 45. It was submitted to the chairman of the committee, and I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that this provision has the approval of the director of operations of the Shipping Board. It was framed after consultation there, and I think is in very good shape. In any event, any correction that needs to be made can be made in conference. I believe it is a better provision than section 45 as it is in the bill. It is intended to meet practically the same purpose and the same object. It is intended to provide for the through billing of goods for export over railroad and shipping lines.

I know it is a long amendment; a great part of section 45 is included in it. We followed the language as far as possible. I know that this is a long amendment and that it is difficult for Senators to understand it just by having it read. Yet, having been called to the attention of the Senate in this way and having been embraced in a general way in section 45 as reported by the committee, I know the Senator from Iowa will give the matter very careful consideration in conference, and I feel that it can be worked into pretty good shape.

Mr. LENROOT. What I would like to ask the Senator is whether they could not work out that same thing with the committee text as well as with the amendment? We know what that is. What is the object of putting in something that Senators really have had no opportunity to consider?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I see this advantage in it: I do not think that section 45 is anything like as good as this provision. But if the provision is not in, the Senate conferees will not have it before them at all. All they will have in conference will be the provision in section 45 as it is now.

Mr. LENROOT. But the subject matter will be before the conferees.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator that the provision in section 45 which I think is especially objectionable is the one under which the rates of our steamship lines will be published and will be made available to the world. I do not think they ought to be, especially in our foreign trade. In the shipping act we require the carriers in interstate commerce to file with the board their maximum rates, and they are made public. That is all right. But we do not require our steamship companies in the foreign trade to publish their rates, because that would give an advantage to their competitors which they ought not to have. Foreign shipping does not publish its rates. That is required under section 45 as it is now. If that were cut out of section 45 I would have no serious objection to the section. That is what this amendment intends really to do, and to meet the situation that would be provided for in that way.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to it; but the Senator will see that the Senate can not intelligently consider very lengthy amendments of this character when first presented.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I appreciate that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have one other amendment that does not relate to water transportation, which has been printed. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following section:

SEC. —. It shall be unlawful for any United States carrier or carriers by rail or water to participate in the continuous or interrupted transportation of passengers or property from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, or from or to any place in the United States to or from a foreign country, where the through rate or through charge by combination of rates for such transportation, whether by rebate, by absorption of storage charges, wharfage charges, or any other charge or charges, or in any manner whatsoever is less than the through rate or through charge by combination of rates between such points on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Shipping Board or the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board, applying at such time for like transportation by United States carriers by rail or water or by rail and water.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have just a brief statement to make with reference to this amendment.

The Congress has for many years legislated to give the Interstate Commerce Commission control over the extraterritorial rate, but the commission has been unable to enforce the law by reason of its lack of jurisdiction over the foreign carrier. As the result, foreign carriers have indiscriminately "cut" the rates fixed by the commission for American carriers by rail and by rail and water, and by such methods have diverted from the American carriers, particularly transcontinental railroads and western steamship companies, so much business as to seriously interfere with their successful operation.

The methods of the foreign carriers were fully explained in hearings before the House committee, which I hold in my hand, by Mr. W. L. Clark, of Seattle, who submitted in evidence photostatic copies of expense bills of the foreign carriers, exemplifying some of the methods of rate cutting and discriminations as between shippers which the commission is unable to reach.

Those will be found on page 2595 of the House hearings and the following pages.

American transcontinental railroads are in dire straits as to finances and their stocks selling way below par, so that Congress is called upon to bolster them financially and concur in that they shall exact higher rates from the public. Notwithstanding this deplorable condition, the Canadian Pacific Railway, one of the principal offenders against rates of United States carriers, is paying dividends at the rate of 10 per cent per annum in addition to putting aside a surplus, and its stock is selling in the market around $150 per share. By its misuse of our domestic freights this Canadian road is having practically a balanced traffic while 45 per cent of the west-bound car movement on the transcontinental roads of the United States consists of empty cars, resulting in a very expensive operation which reacts against American citizens in increased living costs in the necessity for increased rates by the American line upon farm products and merchandise, required to make up its losses due to the diversion to Canadian lines by unfair methods, a traffic consisting of American goods for American consumption, the carriage of which should by law be assured to American railroad and American water carriers.

In the Alaska trades the inroads of the foreign railroad-owned water carriers operating to a small but productive part of Alaska has created a very difficult transportation problem for Alaska as a whole, particularly western and central Alaska, so that Alaska may be robbed of its American service unless it is protected against the foreign carrier. Only one result has followed in these trades, the too great division of the business among many carriers has made it unprofitable for all, and necessitated the raising of rates and reducing the service on those routes, and I am informed that the Canadian lines have recently urged upon the American lines a further raise in rates to make profitable this "too-many-bites-from-a-cherry" operation.

The amendment proposed is to enable the commission to enforce orders against "cut rates" and other objectionable practices by the foreign carrier. We have controlled the American carrier's rates; we should protect them against this unfair foreign method. If this is not done it may be necessary to legislate so that our domestic merchandise shall not be permitted to move from one point in the United States to another in bond through a foreign country. By the provisions of bonding laws we permit Canadian carriers, by cut rates, to compete with American carriers for the traffic of 114,000,000 people. This privilege is used to distort traffic movements within the United States to the great detriment of the American public, involving, as it does, an increased transportation cost on other American products. In return for this valuable privilege the United States carriers may compete against the direct Canadian lines, but not at "cut rates," for the traffic movement of not to exceed 8,000,000 Canadians. We can not insure successful operation of American railroads while such Canadian practices are permitted, and we trust this amendment may be agreed to in its national interests.

Mr. President, in brief it is simply this: Goods may be shipped now, for instance, from Boston or other points in the East, in bond, to Seattle or Tacoma over the Canadian lines. If they are shipped over our railroads they must charge rates under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The practice now is for them to ship these goods, in bond, from, say, Boston to some point where the Canadian Pacific picks them up. It carries them on under reduced rates, cut rates, if you please, rates lowered by way of rebate or other methods, under which the business is diverted to the Canadian Pacific. They go on to the Pacific terminal and then down over an American road to the American territory.

The same operation is carried on over the steamship lines operating between Alaska and Canadian ports and United States ports, with the result, as I pointed out a moment ago, that our people have their traffic diverted from our roads that are controlled by our governmental agencies to these other roads, thereby furnishing to them a load both ways—and that is very advantageous to a railroad, of course, as everybody knows—while many of our trains, in going westward, go there with their cars empty in order to carry the products back. Of course, that is not the sole reason for cars going westward empty, but it has a great deal to do with it.

The purpose of this amendment is to meet that situation by providing that it shall be unlawful for our roads to carry these goods in bond to a foreign carrier that cuts the rate, by rebate or otherwise. That is the only way I see in which it can be met, because we can not deal directly with the foreign carriers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator, for information, whether there is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, or instituted by them, through routes and through rates in foreign territory?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think so, but I can not give the Senator that information.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is not so, would not the effect of the Senator's amendment be this: Suppose, for instance, on the northern border of the Lakes the route through American territory might be 1,000 miles between two points, and through Canadian territory, in a given case, possibly 600 miles. Under the Senator's amendment shippers would have to pay the long rate through American territory, would they not, or the carrier would be debarred from receiving any transportation from the Canadian road that did not pay the full circuitous rate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I rather think not. Here is the way it reads:

It shall be unlawful for any United States carrier or carriers by rail or water to participate in the continuous or interrupted transportation of passengers or property from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, or from or to any place in the United States to or from a foreign country, where the through rate or through charge by combination of rates for such transportation, whether by rebate, by absorption of storage charges, wharfage charges, or any other charge or charges, or in any manner whatsoever is less than the through rate or through charge by combination of rates between such points on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Shipping Board or the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board, applying at such time for like transportation by United States carriers by rail or water or by rail and water.

Possibly that might be the case. What I intended was that if by any rebate in any form they made the rate less than the ordinary competitive rate it should be unlawful.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator think his amendment goes very much further than that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am rather inclined to think it does, since the Senator calls my attention to it. I think that I will withdraw the amendment and offer it when we get into the Senate, if the Senate should not dispose of the bill to-night. I will try to meet that situation, because if it is a fair competitive rate I have no objection to it. I will withdraw the amendment with the idea of trying to frame it to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STANLEY. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

The SECRETARY. After the word "court," in line 27, page 57, strike out sections 25 to 31, inclusive, to the words "Section 32," line 22, page 66.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the following amendment, which I explained yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add to section 2, at the end of the section, the following:

For the purpose of enabling carriers by railroad subject to the commerce act properly to serve the public during the transition period immediately following the termination of Federal control, any such carrier may, at any time after the passage of this act and before the expiration of two years after the termination of Federal control, make application to the transportation board, hereinafter created, for a loan from the United States, setting forth the amount of the loan and the term for which it is desired, the purpose of the loan and the uses to which it will be applied, the present prospective ability of the applicant to repay the loan and meet the requirements of its obligations in that regard, the character and value of the security offered, and the extent to which the public convenience and necessity will be served. The application shall be accompanied by statements showing such facts and details as the board may require with respect to the physical situation, ownership, capitalization, indebtedness, contract obligations, operation, and earning power of the applicant, together with other facts relating to the propriety and expediency of granting the loan applied for and the ability of the applicant to make good the obligation as the board may deem pertinent to the inquiry.

If the board, after such hearing and investigation, with or without notice, as it may direct, finds that the making, in whole or in part, of the proposed loan by the United States is necessary to enable the applicant properly to meet the transportation needs of the people, and that the prospective earning power of the applicant and the character and value of the security offered are such as to furnish reasonable assurance of the applicant's ability to repay the loan within the time fixed therefor, the board may certify to the Secretary of the Treasury its findings of fact and its recommendations as to the amount of the loan which is to be made; the time, not exceeding five years from the making thereof, within which it is to be repaid; the character of the security which is to be offered therefor; and the terms and conditions of the loan.

Upon receipt of such certificate from the board the Secretary of the Treasury at any time before the expiration of 26 months after the termination of Federal control is authorized to make a loan, not exceeding the maximum amount recommended in such certificate, out of any moneys in the revolving fund provided for in this section. All such loans shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to be placed to the credit of the revolving fund provided for in this section. The time, not exceeding five years from the making thereof, within which such loan is to be repaid, the security which is to be taken therefor, which shall be adequate to secure the loan, the terms and conditions of the loan, and the form of the obligation to be entered into, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Loans so made shall be preferred liens upon the income and property of the applicant in the same manner and to the same extent that certificates issued by receivers appointed by the United States courts are preferred liens upon the income and property that is being administered by the receiver.

The board or the Secretary of the Treasury may call upon the Federal Reserve Board for advice and assistance with respect to any such applications or loans.

There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum of $500,000,000, which shall be used as a revolving fund for the purpose of making the loans provided for in this section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The amendment simply recites the House provision providing for a revolving fund whereby the Government can loan to the railroads on deferred liens at 6 per cent money to rehabilitate their systems. The amendment inserts that provision in the Senate bill and raises the amount to $500,000,000, the amount estimated by Director General Hines as the capital needs for the railroads next year. I simply wish the amount raised in order that the conference committee may not be limited in conference to the amount placed in the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What is the amount the Senator proposes?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Five hundred million dollars. That is the estimate in a letter from Director General Hines, in which he says "$400,000,000, possibly $500,000,000." He says, further:

I should say at least 50 per cent additional ought to be expended in order reasonably to provide for the needs of the public service.

The maximum is $500,000,000, but he thinks 50 per cent additional, or $750,000,000 altogether, ought to be expended. If the conditions in the money market are such next year that the railroads can not get the money, the amendment provides that the Government, through a revolving fund, can meet the needs of the railroads by loaning to them on preferred liens at 6 per cent the necessary money.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Does it make provision as to how fast it shall revolve and at what time the loans shall be returned to the Government?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The amendment provides that the transportation board shall administer it.

Mr. STANLEY. It provides that the loan shall not exceed that amount.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey and also of the chairman of the committee to the security that is provided in the amendment. The Senator from New Jersey said that they are preferred liens. The language is:

> Loans so made shall be preferred liens upon the income and property of the applicant in the manner and to the same extent that certificates issued by receivers appointed by the United States courts are preferred liens upon the income and property that is being administered by the receivers.

The loans are not limited to the purpose for which a receiver may issue receiver's certificates. The loans contemplate loans for capital account. I would be very much interested to learn upon what theory we can supersede existing liens upon a railroad by legislative declaration where they are not necessary for the maintenance and operation of the road and the preservation of the securities. I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee upon that subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as a matter of law, the Senator from Wisconsin must know what my opinion would be.

Mr. LENROOT. I think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think that we have any constitutional authority to create a lien upon railroad property which shall be prior to those which are already upon it. Nevertheless I am quite willing that the amendment shall go into conference. I assume that the conferees would have the right to change the terms if they saw fit to do so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I presumed that the rights of the Government were properly safeguarded. The amendment was inserted in the House bill and agreed to by the House; and I suppose any refinement necessary to protect the Government can be made without making it subject to a point of order.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey change the nature of the lien from that provided in the original bill, which created a revolving fund of $250,000,000?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; it copies the exact wording.

Mr. STANLEY. It simply gives them a larger amount to lend?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether the committee considered the proposition?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the committee did not consider the question at all. It was never presented to the committee. I first heard of the proposal when the House adopted the section authorizing the expenditure of $250,000,000 for supplying the railway companies with credit, which it was presumed they could not obtain in the general market.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the rules of the Senate, under what is known as the Curtis rule, if the amendment is agreed to the conferees will be compelled at least to give $250,000,000 for this purpose. They will not be at liberty to consider the merits of the question. It does not seem to me that the conference committee should be foreclosed from the consideration of the entire question, inasmuch as the committee has not considered it in the first instance.

I do not think the amendment should be adopted. If the amendment is adopted, without any question the House provision up to $250,000,000 can be adopted in conference, and if this amendment is adopted the only thing that the conference committee will be at liberty to consider is the amount to be loaned between $250,000,000 and $500,000,000.

Mr. CURTIS. In the judgment of the Senator from Wisconsin, could not the Senator from New Jersey reach the question by offering an amendment to the House bill when it is offered here increasing the amount from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000?

Mr. LENROOT. He could if the House bill became the bill passed by the Senate; but increasing the amount would not be of any value because, presumably, the House bill will not be the one that is passed by the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, I do not want to impose upon the conference the burden of forcing the House appropriation. If the chairman of the committee feels that it is not good policy to provide a revolving fund in order that the railroads might be properly financed in the event of there being no money market, and the number of railroads that we all know at the present time are almost on the verge of receivership are deprived of protection at this time, of course I will withdraw the amendment.

My position is that we are facing almost a crisis in the railroad situation. I happen to know something about the money situation in this country. I know that next year, if the treaty of peace is ratified, Europe will be draining the money market in this country at rates of interest far above that which the railroads can afford to pay for their capital needs.

The hope that we have all entertained that the bill in the period of transition would sustain and protect the great transportation system of the country might be defeated.

It was unfortunate that the provision was not adopted which I presented to the committee in the beginning, which is contained in the bill prepared by the committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, after deliberate study, which was supported by the boards of trade and chambers of commerce throughout the country, providing that a fund of $500,000,000 should be created in order to take care of the financial problems that the railroads might meet when they were turned back in practically a damaged condition.

Therefore I felt that the conference committee should have that item fixed as a maximum so that they might study the situation and not be foreclosed to $250,000,000, which is not sufficient, in my opinion, to meet the financial needs of the railroads.

I warn the Senate at this time that unless some provision of this character is made we are going to see practically financial disaster come to many of the railroads of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to have the Senator from New Jersey retain the floor for a moment while I ask him a question. The committee did not act upon the matter to which he refers at all. Therefore, I have no right to speak for the committee. The Senator from New Jersey has just as good right to act in that behalf as I could possibly have. His judgment upon the matter is a great deal better than mine. I do not know whether or not it will be necessary to make loans of the magnitude suggested, but I am perfectly willing that the subject shall go into conference. I have no objection in the world to that; and I am relying upon the judgment of the Senator from New Jersey with respect to the necessity of increasing the sum which the House has already provided for this purpose.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from Iowa, then, take the position that he is willing to have this proposal go into conference with the only matter in conference being the difference between $250,000,000 and $500,000,000?

Mr. CUMMINS. I should prefer that it should go into conference with the whole matter in controversy, and that is what I am trying to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey. Just how to get the whole subject into conference, in view of the fact that the House has appropriated $250,000,000 in its bill, I am not clear about just at this moment.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I want to call attention to the further fact that with reference to the provision to which I just called attention, so clearly unconstitutional, that matter will not be in conference if this amendment is adopted, because it is identical with the language of the House bill; and under the Curtis rule there is no way by which the conferees could even modify that language so as to make it a valid provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that he reframe the amendment so as not to follow the House provision, and leave the whole subject in conference. I think it can easily be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey will yield to me——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see how that question arises. The House bill is not the bill on which we are now acting. The House bill came over here, it is true, but it is not the bill that is now under consideration by the Senate and that will be amended if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator from New Jersey will yield to me, I desire to ask the Senator from Florida if he is familiar with what is known as the Curtis rule that changes the entire matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not referring to that rule.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me read it to the Senator, and he will at once see that the rule of which he is evidently thinking has been changed. The so-called Curtis rule reads:

> Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses.

When this bill gets to its final stage it will be substituted for the House bill; it will then be the House bill which will be before the conference; and any language that is found either in the Senate amendments or in the House bill which is identical will not be before the conferees.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, the idea is to substitute the pending bill for the House bill; to report the House bill and amend it by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting this entire bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. In that case, I presume the Senator from Wisconsin is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. The purpose of the committee is as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin. It has been our view that we would go through the Senate bill, deal with any amendments that might be offered to it, and at the proper time, after all the amendments, so far as can be foreseen, have been disposed of, either adopted or rejected, I intend then to ask the Senate to take up the House bill, and I intend to move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to substitute for it the Senate bill as it shall have been amended.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, it is possible, if this is the same provision as that in the House bill, that the conferees would be bound to accept whatever is in agreement in both of them; that is possible; although there is a doubt in my mind whether we can not amend the whole House bill by substituting another and put the whole bill in conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has been my purpose to put the whole bill in conference except in so far as the language is identical.

Mr. STANLEY. Do I understand the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has withdrawn his amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am preparing a substitute for it.

Mr. STANLEY. Pending the preparation of the substitute, I ask——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me in order that we may dispose of a matter which I offered a moment ago?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offered an amendment a moment ago and withdrew it. I want to change the form and insert after the word "with," on page 2, line 1, of the amendment the words, "or approved by," so that it will read "by combination of rates between such points on file with or approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

I know that this is a very important matter; the committee may not have considered it; but I think it can be taken to conference, and the Senator from Iowa can then, possibly, work out something that will be satisfactory or reject it altogether if the conference deem it not wise to insert it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to considering it in conference, if the Senator desires to have it so considered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendment was stated except for the words which I have just proposed to insert. I offer it now as a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIAL in the chair). The modification of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the amendment, line 1, after the word "with," it is proposed to insert the words "or approved by," so as to read, "by combination of rates between such points on file with or approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition does the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] desire made of his amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I trust the Senator from Kentucky will withhold his amendment until my substitute for my amendment shall have been acted upon.

Mr. STANLEY. I thought the Senator from New Jersey had withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for action on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is before the Senate.

Mr. STANLEY. I withhold my amendment for the present. I repeat, I understood the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] had withdrawn his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator to withhold his amendment for a moment.

Mr. STANLEY. I withhold the amendment for the purpose of allowing the Senator from New Jersey to present his amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to add:

> That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $500,000,000, which may be loaned to the railroads under such terms and conditions as may be determined by the board and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. [Putting the question.] By the sound, it appears to the Chair that the noes have it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask for a division.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. DIAL's name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and therefore withholds his vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I have agreed to take care of him by pair during that absence and therefore must withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement regarding my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that my pair, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], is not in the Chamber, and I understand he has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. I transfer my pair so that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] will stand paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer the pair which I have with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. THOMAS answered to their names when called.

Mr. COLT, Mr. KNOX, and Mr. WATSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. KENYON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. DIAL's name was called). The present occupant of the chair has a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and therefore withholds his vote.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As I announced before, I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] during his absence. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have had a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], from which I have been released, and I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on public business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—28.

So Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote on this amendment when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I now reoffer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "court," in line 27, page 57, strike out sections 25 to 31, inclusive, to the words "section 32," in line 22, page 66.

Mr. MCKELLAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Before the Senate proceeds to vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky I wish to submit a substitute or series of substitutes therefor, and ask that they may be read. Before I send them to the desk perhaps I should inquire if the Senator from Kentucky prefers to have a roll call directly upon his amendment.

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; I prefer it. The amendments proposed to be offered by the Senator from Illinois are apparently pertinent if my amendment is not agreed to. I think it would be better to pass on the question of my amendment first to strike out the provisions of the bill referred to. I think we could better provide for conditions by inserting, if you choose to insert, the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, with which I am in a general way acquainted, if the sections go out to which my amendment applies. I think we can get such legislation as conservative men think necessary by inserting it as new matter, and I would prefer first to get a vote on my amendment. The only matter before the Senate now is the roll call, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Before the roll is called, if the Senator will permit me, for the information of Senators in the Chamber I should like to have the proposed amendments read and to say a mere word thereon in order that Senators may know what I have in contemplation.

The amendments are intended, first, to fix a specific time during which the committee on wages and working conditions and the regional boards of adjustment may have under consideration the matter in dispute. Secondly, they qualify what now are sections 29 and 30, although in the amendments which I shall offer they are consolidated.

The qualification is in the illegality of the act as provided in the two present sections 29 and 30. So, if the amendment which I offer should be agreed to it would be illegal, for example, to call a strike until 60 days after the decision of the board or its approval of the decision of the committee on wages and working conditions had been made, and the same would hold as regards any action of the carrier in discharging or denying employment to one of its employees.

For the information of the Senate, I will send the amendments to the desk, if I may do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois if it is his desire to offer the modification which he has just described as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; they are offered as amendments to the text of the bill as reported. I recognize the parliamentary situation which would arise if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky should prevail.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not a fact that to properly take care of the parliamentary situation, the Senate should vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois before voting on the amendment to strike out offered by the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CUMMINS. That course seems to me to be not only very wise but very necessary.

I was about to make a suggestion. I know that this part of the bill has excited more controversy throughout the country probably than any other part of the bill, and I want the completest opportunity for examination of the question, and also an opportunity for all Senators to be here when the question is disposed of.

Mr. McCORMICK. I venture to interject that that is very important.

Mr. CUMMINS. Tentatively I am going to make a suggestion, and if I find that it meets with approval I shall make it in form. I think I will ask unanimous consent to vote upon the proposed amendment, whether that of the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Kentucky, in the regular parliamentary way to-morrow at 11.30, so that every Senator may be present and express his opinion by his vote upon it. Is there any objection to that proposition?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I had rather hoped that when we got to the voting we might have a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky first. If his amendment should not be agreed to, then I have prepared some amendments which I desire to offer, and they are very much along the line of the amendment just submitted by the Senator from Illinois. I will state, judging from what I have heard of the Senator's amendment, that those which I have prepared are prepared with express reference to the bill and to bring into it what is called the Canadian system.

Mr. McCORMICK. "Two souls with but a single thought."

Mr. SMOOT. Permit me to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that it would be very much better to have the Senate vote on his amendments to the bill after the bill has been reported to the Senate, because if the amendments of the Senator from Illinois are adopted then some Senators may decide not to vote to strike out.

Mr. McCORMICK. I felt constrained by courtesy to offer the Senator from Kentucky the opportunity which he sought. He had very generously sat down and advised with me upon the terms of the amendment which I had in mind, but I recognize the point made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendments which I propose to offer are calculated to cure, as I see it, defects in the bill, and it will be difficult for Senators to act intelligently upon them if the Senator from Kentucky presses his amendment first.

Mr. STANLEY. I readily see the propriety of such suggestions as have been made touching the perpetuation of boards of conciliation and arbitration without the objectionable feature of compulsory orders commanding men to engage in the personal service of a corporation against their wishes. As I explained to the Senator from Illinois, I am equally firm in the belief that we can settle so much of the bill, pages and pages of it, and then we can better vote to strike out, and, if the vote carries, eliminate the provisions now in the bill and insert, if we care to, as I think we can, a much less cumbersome and much more effective provision than the original proposition. But as I understand the parliamentary situation now before the Senate, we have an amendment submitted, with the yeas and nays ordered, and of course the only thing in order would be to vote, I presume.

Mr. McCORMICK. I presume I may offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; if it is germane. I do not think the amendment as offered would be subject to a substitute.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the rule is that the first thing in order would be the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, on the ground that he seeks to perfect the text of the bill, and that should be done before a motion to strike out is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that is the proper procedure.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then, I will send the amendments to the desk in order that they may be read, and I will say a word thereon, hoping that the unanimous consent for which the Senator from Iowa asks may be granted and the votes may be had to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on line 9 on page 59, strike through, down to and including line 2 on page 60, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"It shall be the duty of the committee of wages and working conditions to consider all complaints respecting wages and working conditions submitted by representatives of employees or of the carriers, and all decisions filed with it and proceedings transferred to it by any regional board of adjustment as herein provided, and within 90 days after the submission, transfer, or filing of any such complaint, proceeding, or decision, to make a decision by a majority vote respecting such complaint or transferred proceeding, or approve, disapprove, or amend such decision and transmit its decision or other action to the board, together with a transcript of the record in the proceedings; or, if evenly divided upon any such matter, to transmit such matter to the board, together with a transcript of the record in the proceedings.

"The board shall, within 90 days after any such decision, action, or proceeding has been transmitted to it as herein provided, approve or disapprove such decision or other action of the committee of wages and working conditions or render a decision respecting any matter on which the committee has been evenly divided, and shall, within the same period, make and publish a report which shall contain a statement of the matter involved in the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed proper to secure a just settlement thereof, together with its decision.

"The board shall promptly certify to the commission every decision or other action of the committee of wages and working conditions, when approved by the board, and every decision of the board with respect to matters transmitted to it for decision, and the decisions and other matters so certified shall be taken into consideration by the commission in any proceedings in which they may be relevant."

On page 62, line 3, strike out all of the paragraph after the word "filed" and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "together with a transcript of the record of the proceedings."

On page 62 strike out line 10 and the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Such regional board shall transfer such proceedings, together with a transcript of the record therein, to the committee of wages and working conditions."

On page 62, after line 12, insert the following new paragraph:

"It shall be the duty of every regional board of adjustment, within 60 days after any complaint, grievance, matter, or dispute is submitted to it, to reach a decision thereon and file such decision with the committee of wages and working conditions, as provided herein, unless such decision relates only to personal discipline; or, within such time, to transfer the proceedings to such committee as provided herein, in case such regional board is evenly divided upon the matter in controversy."

Strike out sections 29, 30, and 31 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 29. Any carrier subject to this act which shall, for the purpose of enforcing or supporting its position or contention with respect to any demand made by its employees relating to terms of employment, discharge, suspend or deny employment to any of its employees prior to or within 60 days after the publication of the report of the board respecting the matter in dispute, and any employee of a carrier subject to this act who ceases or quits work in combination with other employees thereof, prior to or within 60 days after the publication of such report, for the purpose of inducing or compelling such carrier to grant or continue to grant terms of employment, or for the purpose of helping other employees to induce or compel their employer to grant or continue to grant terms of employment, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to deny to any employee of a carrier the right to quit work individually for any reason.

"SEC. 30. Any person who knowingly incites, encourages, abets, counsels, or aids in any manner any carrier or any employee thereof to violate any provision of section 29 shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both."

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly; I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. CURTIS. I could not hear all of the reading of the amendment, but I gather from what I did hear of it that it is patterned after the law of Canada. Is that so?

Mr. McCORMICK. It is patterned, Mr. President, after the law which owes its origin to Mackenzie King, whose very considerable reputation in this country and in Europe is due to that act.

Mr. WARREN. If I may ask a further question, has the law been entirely satisfactory to both employer and employee?

Mr. McCORMICK. I know of but one cause for dissatisfaction, and that the amendment seeks to meet. It has been charged in Canada that there have been instances when the mediating boards have kept disputes under advisement for indefinite and protracted periods. It was for that reason I fixed a limit during which the board might have disputes under consideration.

Mr. WARREN. But barring that change, which is surely an improvement, am I to understand that the law as enforced in Canada has been reasonably satisfactory?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think that it has been more than reasonably satisfactory; it has been a notable success.

It seems to me, Mr. President, in the first place, that we must reckon with the grave improbability that the provisions of the bill as reported can ever become law. It seems to me futile for the Senate to sustain a plan for the settlement of industrial disputes which, at this time, at least, is doomed to defeat.

Furthermore, I gravely doubt the prudence of undertaking to incorporate into this railroad bill a principle of industrial settlement which is absolutely unknown to our experience. If we go as far as the provisions amended as I propose to amend them would go, we shall be going a great way. We know how men rebel against the idea of coercion of labor; how men whose only considerable property is the labor of their hands consider such coercion as tantamount to the conscription of property or its confiscation.

It might be argued, from the extreme conservative viewpoint, that the proposal of the bill is dangerous, for if we establish the principle that the Government may summarily lay its hands, as it were, upon the manual property of the workman on the railroads, there is no telling when next and how next it may be sought to apply that principle to the conscription of other property. The Dartmouth College case had consequences which few saw at the time that it was heard and decided. So would it be, in my judgment, if these provisions in the bill became law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. Just a word, and I am done.

Mr. CUMMINS. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question; I am not seeking the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the attitude of labor or the labor leaders toward the Canadian law?

Mr. McCORMICK. Practically none of them have discussed either the Canadian act or the pending bill with me, let me say to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know but that the Senator had inquired into it. The labor leaders of the country are quite as much opposed to legislation of the character suggested by the Senator from Illinois as they are to the legislation suggested by the committee; indeed, upon the whole, I think they are more opposed to it, for the reason that the Canadian law suspends or, as the Senator from Illinois has put it, conscripts their right for a certain period without assuming on the part of the Government any responsibility for their wages. I really think that the laboring people of America would far rather that the Government would attempt to do justice for them than they would to have the Government deny them the right to strike pending an investigation, which might be long or short.

Mr. Gompers says, Mr. Stone says, and others who are interested in that question say that there have been more strikes in Canada since the enactment of the Canadian law than were ever known in the United States, and that if there is any statute in the whole world which has proven an utter and complete failure it is the Canadian statute with regard to strikes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator argue that the laboring men would prefer an absolute prohibition to strike to a qualified prohibition to strike?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not say that; but I think a great many of them would rather have an absolute prohibition against strikes, provided the Government undertook to adjudicate the disputes which arise between themselves and their employers.

Mr. McCORMICK. The amendment does not touch the adjudicatory provisions of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing in the Canadian law, at least—I have not read the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. McCORMICK. I hope that the request of the Senator that these amendments may be voted on at noon to-morrow may be granted, because in that time these amendments may be printed. They were hurriedly prepared this afternoon, and only reached my hands half an hour ago.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, a motion to strike out certain provisions of the bill is clearly intended, as will be observed from a reading of the amendment presented by the Senator from Illinois, and I yielded on that account. A motion to strike out clears the way for the new and voluminous amendment now presented, which has much merit in it. Whether or not I can concur in the whole amendment I do not know, because I never saw it until it was offered. I repeat that there is much in it that has merit, so far as the principle involved is concerned, and that I have discussed with the Senator from Illinois; but the amendment should be printed, carefully studied, and discussed by the Senate. The amendment can better be offered—and it will have to be offered—as an original proposition. For that reason I think it much better—and I think that is the parliamentary status—that the motion to strike out should be determined one way or the other.

If the motion to strike out does not carry, it may be possible to do something with the proposal of the Senator from Illinois in the way of amending the original bill. If it does carry, the amendment of the Senator from Illinois can much better be offered as an original proposition after the pages of superfluous provisions in the bill are out of the way.

But, be that as it may, my understanding is that the motion to strike out has been offered. The motion of the Senator from Illinois is not offered as an amendment to my amendment, but a motion to strike out is as much a motion to perfect the text as any other motion; and my understanding is that such a motion is now pending before the Senate. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Illinois simply for the purpose of having his amendment read. The only motion that the Senate can pass on, however, is the motion I made to strike out certain paragraphs, and on that motion I ask for the regular order.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator from Illinois has made his motion as a substitute, his would be first in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. He has not, though.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has offered that to perfect the text, and it has precedence.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, I am ready for a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask if, when a motion to strike out is made, amendments to perfect the text are not first in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so held.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So that any amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to perfect the text of this bill will take precedence over the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, even though the motion of the Senator from Kentucky is pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so held. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the whole matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. I made the suggestion, hoping that I might reach some conclusion about it; but I am convinced now that I could not get unanimous consent, and therefore I am ready to have the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I understand the parliamentary position to be this: The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] has made a motion to strike out certain parts of the bill. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] has offered certain amendments to that part of the text to which the motion of the Senator from Kentucky relates. Consequently, his amendments take precedence of that motion until they are disposed of. If that be a correct statement of the situation, then the vote which we take to-night, if we vote at all, must first be upon the amendments or substitutes proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so held.

Mr. THOMAS. Those are somewhat involved, and are very important, and Senators can not vote upon them intelligently until they understand them, and we can not understand them until we have time to examine them. Hence, to vote upon them to-night would be to vote blindly. So far as I am concerned, that is true. I think, therefore, the suggestion that they be printed and taken up to-morrow is the only one upon which we can act and at the same time act intelligently.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment, and then I will yield the floor. I wish to add that when the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday yielded the floor he announced his desire, before a vote was taken upon the motion made by the Senator from Kentucky, to discuss those features of the bill, and I am satisfied that it is his purpose to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Alabama is here.

Mr. THOMAS. I made that statement because I was ignorant of the presence of the Senator from Alabama. I have no wish to postpone for one moment a final vote upon this proposition, although I had intended saying something upon the subject; but I am quite as anxious to get a final vote upon the bill as the Senator having charge of the measure can be. Consequently, I believe we can make time by being furnished with printed copies of the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois, which, of course, is impossible until to-morrow.

I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I was simply going to suggest that it was obvious that a vote can not be had to-night. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] has introduced some amendments in the nature of a substitute that should be read very closely by every Senator. Why can not the matter be composed by agreeing that at 12 o'clock to-morrow, or, say, at 12.30, a vote will be had on these various amendments relating to the compulsory arbitration feature?

I suppose that parliamentarily the way to proceed would be to vote first on the various amendments that are offered to the matter proposed to be stricken out; but I hope, for obvious reasons, that a unanimous-consent agreement can be reached which will permit us to have a vote first on the motion to strike out. That will require unanimous consent, because the parliamentary rule is the other way.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If that unanimous consent were had, and we voted first upon the motion to strike out, and it failed, what then would be the status of the amendments to the text of the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. I confess I can not answer the Senator as to what the effect would be.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I say, assume that the motion to strike out failed, what then would be the parliamentary status?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator would still have the right to offer his amendment as an amendment to the original text. I am sure of that. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Personally, I raise no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as I stated a while ago, I had prepared an amendment which is very much the same as that offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I had intended offering it, however, only in the event that the motion to strike out the entire section should fail. I should like very much to join in the request that by unanimous consent we first vote upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, and, if that should fail, then the amendment which has been offered here—either the one offered by the Senator from Illinois or the one which I have prepared—could be taken up for consideration. I think no good purpose could be served by taking up these amendments if the motion of the Senator from Kentucky should prevail; and I believe I will now offer the amendment which I have had prepared, so that it may be printed and considered along with the amendments proposed by the Senator from Illinois. They are very much the same, but we have had no opportunity to compare them critically; and I join in the request that the Senate now take a recess or adjourn until to-morrow, when these matters may be taken up in that order.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not see any reason why all parliamentary usage here should be sidetracked or overruled or abrogated in order to take up a matter out of its order, and I shall object to anything of the kind. This bill is entitled to be perfected, if it can be, before any part of it is stricken out, and it is in order to move to strike it out at any time. I shall insist that we proceed in an orderly way, and according to the regular rules and usages.

Mr. THOMAS. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. KIRBY. I would suggest, further, that I agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa that this matter ought to go over until 12 o'clock to-morrow, or 1 o'clock, in order that everybody may have an opportunity to read these amendments.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I should be glad if the Senator from Iowa would ask unanimous consent that that may be done; or, if he does not care to do so, I will.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing. As I said a few moments ago, I should like to see every Member of the Senate here when these questions are disposed of; so I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, the Senate proceed to vote without further debate on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I do not name the order in which those votes shall occur. Let that be determined by parliamentary law and procedure.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is it the intention to adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to ask the Senate to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. If a recess is taken, of course we can not take up the sugar bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator from Iowa ask that this matter be taken up at 1 o'clock, and that the Senate meet at 11 o'clock, and give us an opportunity to pass the sugar bill to-morrow before 1 o'clock?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hate to refuse an appeal of that kind, even if it were in my power; but I must insist upon the railroad bill being considered continuously until it is disposed of. We are meeting a great crisis in the railroad situation; and aside from the great importance of it in order to take care of the transportation situation, if we do not pass the railroad bill by Saturday night there will be no recess of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the importance of the railroad bill, but no one can possibly imagine that this bill can become the law before the Christmas holidays. The most that can be done is to get it to conference within that time. The sugar bill is of very great importance. It ought not to take very long to dispose of the report on the sugar bill, since the Senate has passed it, the House has passed it, and all we must do is to concur in or reject what the House has done, and because of that I shall object to unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Mississippi believe that, inasmuch as the parliamentary situation is as simple as he has described it, the sugar bill can be disposed of in an hour?

Mr. HARRISON. I should think it ought to be disposed of in two minutes.

Mr. WATSON. I should think so. If we meet at 11 o'clock and take up the sugar controversy between 11 and 12, will that be sufficient?

Mr. HARRISON. It is perfectly agreeable to me that we adjourn until 11 o'clock, and then at 1 o'clock take up the railroad bill, devoting the first two hours to proceeding with the sugar legislation. We will try to finish it in five minutes. If no opposition arises to it we can, because the amendment made in the House yesterday was adopted by 257 to 31 votes.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, before the Senator from Mississippi continues in this vein, I merely want to ask that, if consent be had, provision also be made that we may have an hour's debate before we vote, at any hour which may be fixed, on the pending amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. That is perfectly agreeable to me. I only want a little time for us to get an opportunity to pass the sugar bill; that is all.

Mr. MCCORMICK. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. HARRISON. I think we might take it up to-night and pass it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to do that. If the Senate will take it up to-night, I shall be very glad to ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator sees that there are a good many angles to these propositions.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gerry	La Follette	Sheppard
Capper	Hale	Lenroot	Smith, S. C.
Colt	Harris	McCormick	Smoot
Cummins	Harrison	McNary	Sutherland
Curtis	Henderson	Moses	Thomas
Dial	Jones, Wash.	New	Underwood
Edge	Kellogg	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Elkins	Keyes	Nugent	Warren
Fernald	Kirby	Poindexter	Watson
Gay	Knox	Pomerene	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absent Senators.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. DIAL's name was called). The present occupant of the chair has a pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and withholds his vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as before, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when the name of Mr. Kenyon was called). The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is engaged in holding a meeting of the Committee on Education and Labor, and it is impossible for him to come into the Chamber at this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent on account of official business of the Senate, but I understand that he would vote on the procedure in reference to this motion as I would, and therefore I feel that I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when Mr. WILLIAMS's name was called). I desire to announce, for the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and that he is absent to-night on account of business.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BALL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Ashurst	McKellar	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Harrison	McNary	Sheppard
Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Kirby	Nugent	Trammell

NAYS—33.

Ball	Gay	Lenroot	Sutherland
Capper	Gerry	McCormick	Thomas
Colt	Hale	Moses	Underwood
Cummins	Harris	New	Warren
Curtis	Henderson	Phipps	Watson
Edge	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Wolcott
Elkins	Kellogg	Smoot
Fernald	Keyes	Stanley
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Sterling

NOT VOTING—49.

Bankhead	Gronna	Nelson	Simmons
Beckham	Harding	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Johnson, Calif.	Owen	Smith, Md.
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Spencer
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Penrose	Swanson
Culberson	Kenyon	Phelan	Townsend
Dial	King	Pittman	Wadsworth
Dillingham	La Follette	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Fall	Lodge	Reed	Williams
Fletcher	McCumber	Robinson
France	McLean	Sherman
Gore	Myers	Shields

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand the roll was called before. The Senator from Mississippi made a motion to adjourn. The next thing in order is for the Secretary to call the roll of the absent Senators, and if that does not develop a quorum, then the next motion will be that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The motion we have just voted on was a motion to adjourn, was it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. NORRIS. That does not require a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senate refused to adjourn. A majority was against it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it necessary to call the names of the absentees because a quorum did not develop on the motion to adjourn?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska probably was not in when the prior motion was made. I moved that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. Thereupon the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] called for a quorum. A quorum failed to appear upon the first roll call. Thereupon the Senator from Mississippi moved to adjourn. My motion to take a recess to 11 o'clock to-morrow is, I suppose, pending, and can not be disposed of until a quorum is developed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Was not the motion to recess superseded by the motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HARRISON. The Chair thinks, then, that after the presence of a quorum has been developed we must vote again on the motion to recess?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so holds.

Mr. HARRISON. Without a new motion being made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so holds. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. TRAMMELL answered to their names when called.

Mr. FRANCE and Mr. McKELLAR entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is not well taken. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the regular order. Let the motion to take a recess be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. The vote was had and after that there was a suggestion of no quorum, and the roll was called and no quorum was developed. Then a motion was made to adjourn. Does the Chair hold that that is not intervening business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No business has been transacted since the roll was called. The roll call has just been completed.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to take a recess.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must know very well that his point of no quorum is not in order. The presence of a quorum was developed and a motion was then made to take a recess.

Mr. HARRISON. I have asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to take a recess.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. DIAL's name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], and in the absence of that Senator withholds his vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair and transfer that I previously made, I vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). I make the same announcement with reference to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. He is engaged in an important committee meeting and can not be present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair that I made a while ago. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I find that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ball	Edge	Gay	Jones, N. Mex.
Capper	Elkins	Gerry	Jones, Wash.
Colt	Fernald	Hale	Kellogg
Cummins	France	Harris	Kenyon
Curtis	Frelinghuysen	Henderson	Keyes

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the motion to take a recess, offered by the Senator from Iowa, the yeas are 41, the nays are 5. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. As on the previous vote, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. DIAL'S name was called). The present occupant of the chair has a pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and therefore withholds his vote.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement regarding my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement in reference to my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] with the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Gerry	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Harrison	Kirby	Nugent	Stanley
Henderson	McNary	Sheppard	Trammell

NAYS—30.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McKellar	Stanley
Capper	Harris	McNary	Sterling
Colt	Harrison	Moses	Sutherland
Cummins	Henderson	New	Thomas

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the point of order?

Mr. THOMAS. The point of order is that until we have a quorum we can do nothing except to vote on a motion to adjourn or request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion now is to instruct the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. HARRISON. I have asked for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can not entertain a request for the yeas and nays on the motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a division.

On a division the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. KENYON, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I renew my motion that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a minute?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the Senator is willing to agree that to-morrow, at some time, he will try to give us an hour and a half to consider the sugar bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will, Mr. President. I recognize that there ought to be a disposition of the sugar bill, if possible; and, in so far as I can control it, I will do what the Senator from Mississippi suggests—give an hour and a half for the consideration of the sugar bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator object to asking unanimous consent that at some time to-morrow, after the Senate convenes and before 5 o'clock, an hour and a half shall be given for the consideration of the sugar bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will do that. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, between the hours of 11 and half past 12, the message of the House of Representatives with respect to the sugar bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, is the Senator making that request at this time, or does he intend to make that request to-morrow?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am making it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am not going to object, but I am simply going to prophesy that it will be an hour and a half wasted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am afraid that is true; but I am very anxious to get forward with the railroad bill and I hope the arrangement I have proposed may facilitate the disposition of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. I shall not object, because that is what I want.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to understand clearly what the request is before I decide whether I shall object or not. The Senator's request is that to-morrow, between the hours of 11 and half-past 12, the sugar bill be considered, and the Senator asks unanimous consent for that purpose?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my request.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wanted to be sure. I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, December 18, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 17, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, let Thy grace possess our hearts and abide with us that with perfect urbanity, justice and brotherly love we may fulfill the arduous duties laid upon us and at the close of the day's session hear the "well done, good and faithful servant," and thus go on our way rejoicing. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FEDERAL OFFICE BUILDING AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. RUCKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday unanimous consent was asked for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 484) for the construction of a Federal office building at St. Louis. A colloquy occurred here which amounted to an objection, and, as I understand it, there was a direction from the Chair as to what should be done with the bill, so far as the calendar is concerned. And the last remark, I think, was that the bill should pass to the foot of the calendar. I understand that it was not left on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and I ask that it be reinstated on the calendar.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman refers to the bill H. R. 484?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; and I merely ask that it be put back on the calendar where it was.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it is back on the calendar.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the Committee on the Public Lands may be passed without prejudice. I make this request for this reason: We have two bills that we ought to call up, and I think possibly they should be passed; but since the committee reported those bills some criticism has been made and some charges are made about the interests concerned in the bills. The committee is endeavoring to get fuller information on the bills, which it thinks the House is entitled to, and for that reason I make this request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Public Lands be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what will be the status of the call of the Committee on the Public Lands if it be passed now without prejudice? Will it resume its place on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the gentleman means that it shall be passed at this time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the request, it is that it go over until the next Wednesday after the holidays.

Mr. SINNOTT. Until after the holidays. That is what I mean. It would naturally come up then.

Mr. GARD. I made the inquiry to ascertain what the situation would be under the request made by the gentleman from Oregon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt, but the Chair thinks it would hardly come up on the next Wednesday on the request that the gentleman made. The Chair understands the gentleman now to request that it be passed to-day, with the privilege of coming up again on the first Wednesday after the holiday recess. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what committee has the call after the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman from Oregon had any consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs as to whether there would be any objection to that?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have just spoken to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], and there is no objection from him.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman specify the bill that he refers to?

Mr. RAKER. They are all the bills on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why does not the gentleman from Oregon ask specifically to have the call rest upon the Committee on the Public Lands on the first Wednesday after we meet after the Christmas holidays?

Mr. SINNOTT. I understood that the Speaker stated that as a modification of my request.

The SPEAKER. That was the request of the Chair last put. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know from the chairman of the committee, in the event this matter goes over the holidays, whether it would be his expectation in January to call up the Uinta bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is one of the bills about which we expect to get further information, and I will assure the gentleman from Michigan that I shall not undertake to bring up that bill until the chairman of the committee has had full conference and understanding with the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will call the next committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Indian Affairs had legislation which it expected to bring up to-day, but it finds itself in this position: The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], the proposer of the bill H. R. 288, is indisposed and can not come on the floor to-day; in view of that fact, I ask unanimous consent that this committee be passed over without prejudice until the first Wednesday after the holidays.

The SPEAKER. Well, that day has already been assigned to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SNYDER. Then I modify by asking that the committee take its place immediately after the legislation from the Committee on the Public Lands is finished.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Indian Affairs may come in immediately after the business from the Committee on the Public Lands is finished after the holidays. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not think the committee should ask that it be continued. As it is, we are having one committee fall out and another take its place, and it will surely create endless confusion. I do not desire to obstruct legislation, but if the gentleman has not anything to consider he had better let it go over until he does have some legislation; and therefore I object to the request.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SNYDER. I understand it is a perfectly orderly proceeding, and we were ready to proceed to-day, except for the fact that the proposer of this legislation is unable to be present, and he requested me to make this request to the House, as he is anxious—as we all are—to get this legislation through at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARD. I had objected, and I continue the objection; not for any reason of embarrassing the committee, but if the gentleman referred to is ill—and I suspect he is, unfortunately—then sufficient time ought to be allotted to him to recover; and on the call of committees his bill will be duly and easily reached, and the gentleman can have the legislation considered. If we pursue this course, it tends to create embarrassment among committees and endless confusion, unless the orderly and rightful consideration of the calendar is adhered to in the call of committees. If the Committee on Indian Affairs has no other bill for consideration, it should not ask that any other than the regular order be pursued.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman adhere to his objection?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I am not particularly tenacious about this. I am simply doing it at the request of the proposer of the legislation.

The SPEAKER. Does the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs desire to bring up any business?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman from Ohio objected?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. All right. I do not care to bring up anything further to-day.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I call up the bill H. R. 7656.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds calls up the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7656, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7656, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury a detailed statement showing all real and personal property outside of the District of Columbia which has been acquired under and by virtue of said acts and which is now owned by the United States; and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately proceed to sell the same, after due advertisement as provided by law, and to cover the proceeds into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts and to make report of such sales to Congress: Provided, That in all sales of residences the Secretary of the Treasury shall give the preference in the right to purchase to individuals who bona fide desire to purchase the same for use as a home, but not more than one house shall be sold to the same person: Provided further, That in the sales of such residences the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, sell the same partly on credit to citizens of the United States who are heads of families and furnish testimonials showing that they are law-abiding, industrious, and patriotic, and that they intend in good faith to occupy the same with their families in all cases of such credit sales, reserving title in the United States until fully paid for, or conveying title to the purchaser and taking from him a mortgage upon the property to secure the deferred payments.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Labor shall, immediately upon the passage of this act, deliver possession of all houses built in the District of Columbia, under and by virtue of said acts, to the Public Building Commission created by the Sixty-fifth Congress for such uses and purposes as said Public Building Commission may decide.

SEC. 4. That all land within the District of Columbia, acquired under the said acts and which is still vacant and unimproved, and all personal property in said District of Columbia acquired under said acts, shall, by the Secretary of Labor, be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury at once, to be disposed of in the same manner as provided in section 2 for the sale of property outside the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That if title to any real estate, either within or without the District of Columbia, acquired under any of the acts which are to be repealed by this act, has been taken in the name of the United States Housing Corporation, or any other agency, created or acting under said acts, or any of them, the said United States Housing Corporation or other agency shall, immediately upon the passage of this act, convey to the United States of America, by good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance, all of such real estate wherever situate.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Labor, the United States Bureau of Housing and Transportation, the United States Housing Corporation, and each and every other person or agency now or heretofore operating or acting under and by virtue of the said act of May 16, 1918, or any act or acts amendatory thereof, in possession of any notes, mortgages, contracts, or other evidences of indebtedness to the United States, or to any such officials or agencies for the benefit of the United States, by reason of any advances or loans of money to any transportation company, municipality, person, firm, or corporation, made by any of such officers or agencies for the United States, shall, immediately upon the passage of this act, take such action as may be necessary to vest absolute title to such evidences of indebtedness in the United States of America and deliver the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall adjust and collect the same according to their tenor and effect, paying the proceeds thereof into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 7. That upon the passage of this act, if there be any uncompleted contracts, or any pending claims growing out of contracts completed or uncompleted, all such contracts and documents relating thereto shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury and the same adjusted and settled by the proper officers in the Treasury Department.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "United States," strike out the semicolon and insert "and also showing use to which each piece of property has been applied up to the armistice and thereafter."

Page 2, line 12, after the word "who," strike out the words "bona fide."

Page 2, line 17, after the word "and," insert "who shall."

Page 2, line 18, after the word "furnish," strike out the word "testimonials" and insert "satisfactory evidence."

Page 2, line 21, insert a semicolon after the word "families."

Page 3, line 4, insert a comma after the word "act."

Page 3, line 15, strike out the word "if" and insert the word "where."

Line 17, insert a comma after the word "act."

Page 3, line 19, insert a comma after the word "agency."

Page 4, line 6, strike out the word "in" and insert the word "having," and in the same line after the word "of" insert the words "or title to."

Page 4, line 19, after the word "that" strike out "upon the passage of this act, if there be" and insert "where there are."

Page 4, line 20, insert a comma after the word "contract."

Page 4, line 23, after the word "be" insert the word "immediately."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules general debate may be had for two hours. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to make arrangement for a division of the time?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That time belongs half to those in favor of the bill and half to those opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has in mind the control of the division of time between individuals.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to an hour as being in favor of the bill, and somebody opposed to the bill is entitled to the other hour.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have no advice as to whether there is opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill who desires to control the time in opposition?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, under the rule I understand I am recognized for an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We have thoroughly investigated and considered the whole proposition and the committee is unanimously of the opinion that the bill should pass. I am suffering from a severe case of tonsilitis and will not be able to discuss in detail the merits of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the merits of the bill, as I desire to bring to public attention some instances of maladministration and wasteful extravagance that have occurred in the conduct of the work of this bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD on the merits of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LANGLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], who is the author of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am extremely glad that we have at last gotten this bill before the House for consideration. This bill was introduced on the 21st of July last and reported by the committee unanimously on the 30th day of July last. Several times I have called to the attention of the House the situation with reference to it and have appealed to the House to give a few minutes of time in which this bill might be considered and, if the House agreed with the committee, to enact it into law. I want to say that when the war began it became necessary, as we all know, because of the fact that private capital either could not or would not engage in the business of providing homes for workmen, for the Government to go outside of its usual functions and engage in that business. Your committee in the Sixty-fifth Congress did their best, in the drafting of the bill under which this bureau was organized, to protect the interests of the Government and try to effectuate the purposes of the legislation.

Though hedged about as we tried to hedge it, yet after the bill had been passed and after this organization had been created it soon grew to immense proportions. Thousands of employees were brought here of every chaarcter. Although we placed in the bill itself the entire force of the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury at the command of this organization, they proceeded at once to call to their assistance and place on the pay roll a large number of high-priced architects from different portions of the country. There was absolutely no necessity for the employment of a single architect by this bureau. The Acting Supervising Architect, Mr. Wetmore, had been before the committee and he had advised us that as a greater amount of Government work in the ordinary course—the building of post offices and the like—had ceased, his force could do the work which would be required by this bureau. But they went outside and employed these architects, very expensive employees, at large salaries, and put them on the pay roll.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman how much was expended in that line?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There has been $100,000,000 appropriated. There was drawn out of the Treasury $70,000,000, and $30,000,000 was never drawn out. The Appropriations Committee called upon the bureau to refund to the Treasury the money on hand, and they turned over $2,500,000. So $67,500,000 has been expended altogether by the bureau.

Now, gentlemen, that was bad enough; but I want to call your attention to the fact that in almost every project undertaken by these people, instead of using the force of the Supervising Architect, instead of using their own high-priced architects which they had employed, in almost every case they went outside of both of them and employed special architects for the particular work. Right here under the nose of Congress you have an object lesson of riotous and inexcusable extravagance. I refer to what are now called Government hotels on the Plaza. Everyone must concede that they are very commonplace and very plain and very cheap and intended to be temporary. When the bureau came to construct those buildings, 12 buildings, two wings to each, all of them nearly duplicates, instead of using the Supervising Architect's Office, instead of using their own architects, they went outside and employed Mr. Waddy B. Wood, an architect of the city of Washington, and agreed to pay him a fee of $25,000 to draw the plans for those common buildings on the Plaza. That is not all. They paid Mr. Wood, in addition to that, an overhead, as they call it, of 100 per cent. In other words, where Mr. Wood had a man employed who was getting $200 a month he got $400 from the Housing Corporation to assist in the drafting of these plans.

Now, my friends, let me say something right here while we are going along. This is not a political proposition. God knows, there is no politics in it with me. As I told a gentleman the other day, I do not care anything about his politics, for if a man is a grafter his being a Democrat or his being a Republican does not change his character. If he is a grafter, he is a grafter. [Applause.] These fellows who are running the bureau are pretty well mixed up in their politics; do not worry about that. They are not all Democrats, and they are not all Republicans, but the record shows that the grafters are pretty numerous.

Now, let me tell you something else about that, and necessarily I have not the time to go through with all of it, and I am talking about these things because they are right under our nose. They put up some dormitories down here at the navy yard for the navy-yard employees. They brought skilled mechanics here from all parts of the country to work in the navy yard, and these mechanics had no place in which to live, and it was proper to provide some place for them, as the Government had to keep them. So the bureau went down here and bought a lot of land, with a cemetery on one side and a workhouse and a smallpox hospital and jail and a lot of other "desirable" conditions on the other side, and they built what they called dormitories down there—the very cheapest concerns you ever saw—with little bits of rooms with just about space enough in them to slide one small single bed in. And yet those dormitories cost $685 per room.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Do you know whether any one of those rooms was ever occupied by any mechanic working in the navy yard?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. My information is that not a single, solitary one of them ever occupied a room there.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How many of these rooms were built?

Mr. BROOKS of Indiana. Five hundred and eighty-five.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman to say that not one of them has been occupied?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not by any Government workers. I understand that at one time some soldiers who were there temporarily occupied them.

Mr. LANGLEY. And they were all equipped with furniture?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All equipped and furnished completely with new furniture, and afterwards the furniture was hauled out and carried down to some place and sold at auction at a very small part of the original cost.

I want to tell you how they got the furniture. This is extremely interesting and shows how means of separating Uncle Samuel from his cash were devised. They employed a firm known as Myers & Phillips. This firm was organized at just about this time. Mr. Myers, who was a witness before the Senate subcommittee—and the testimony is all here—testified. He did not say it was organized for this express purpose. He belonged to another firm, named Barnett, Phillips & Myers, but the firm of Myers & Phillips was organized just about the time that they were employed as purchasers of furniture for the bureau. Now, then, instead of going into the open market, going to manufacturers of furniture, instead of going to wholesale dealers and undertaking to buy stuff that was in stock, Myers & Phillips undertook to draw special designs for the furniture they were to put in these dormitories and these houses all over the country and have them manufactured to order. And they got a fee as architects to draw the designs and they got a commission for buying the furniture. Now, if you can beat that, I wish you would show me how.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are these men still at large?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the matter been called to the attention of the Department of Justice?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will state to the gentleman that the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is making an investigation, and my information is that they intend to interview the Department of Justice when they get through.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield further for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What was paid in this fee for the plans of the furniture?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not remember, but it is in the hearings. They were paid a certain percentage.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Did I understand the gentleman to say that they sold the furniture?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; out of all these dormitories down at the navy yard.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Is it not a fact that they were refurnished?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. And being sold to-day?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And being sold again.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is it not also true that the furniture sold at auction brought less than 10 per cent of what it cost the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I never did know just what it brought, but I understand it brought a very small proportion of the original cost.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is my information.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Was any architect employed to design the refurnishing that went in there?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not know as to that.

Now, I must hurry along and try to get a few of these things stated. I said here some time ago certain things about this bureau, and one gentleman in the bureau wrote an article in the newspapers and stated that what I said was not correct. I made a statement here on the floor to the effect that they paid $4,800 for blinds and hardware to go in these dormitories on the Plaza; that they paid $5,000 for the painting of the blinds, and that when the blinds and the hardware, painted and delivered at the place, were there, they cost $17,200 just to swing them or hang them up. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. How much was that for each blind?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Nearly $7 a pair; about $6.90, to be accurate.

Now, then, that gentleman disputed that statement. But it was absolutely true, and the record shows it. I have the statement of Mr. Waite, the chief accountant, who is as good a one as there is in this country, in the employ of the Senate committee, to the effect that it is absolutely correct, and it cost the Government $6.90 a pair to hang those blinds.

Now, then, I want to tell you something else that they are doing down there. The news of the reporting of this bill went out, and just so soon as this bill was reported these gentlemen down at the bureau who wanted to hold their jobs immediately rushed down to the dormitories and interviewed the 1,500 or 2,000 girls—whatever the number there is down there, war workers—and told them we were going to throw them out in the street, turn them out from house and home at once; and instantly every one of the young ladies went to her Member of Congress and got up a great stir over the report that we were going to put them on the street. There never was such an intention on the part of the committee. The committee believes that these dormitories down there ought to be continued just as long as there is an absolute necessity for the continuation of the project and so long as it does not cost the Government money to run it.

But whenever it does, whenever the Government has to go down in its pocket and put up extra money to run them, or whenever the necessity for them ceases, they ought not to be run a day longer, because it is not a proper function of the United States Government to run hotels. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, let me tell you further what they are doing down there. Do you know what the manager of that outfit gets in the way of salary? I have insisted all along, and I insist now, that the Government does not want to make any money out of those girls. They ought to get their board and lodging there for exact cost. [Applause.] That is what they ought to get it for, and the business ought to be economically conducted so that they would not have to pay exorbitant overhead charges, as they have had to pay and are now paying. Do you know what the manager gets down there? It is either $4,500 or $5,000. I think the salary is $5,000. In addition to that she has a suite of rooms, with bath and all that, and board, and her mother gets a room and board, or suite of rooms and board—whatever it is—and she has a private secretary who gets a salary and room and board, and she has a car, I understand, furnished by the Government, which she uses for her sole use, and a chauffeur, who gets his salary and board, and the Government pays for the gasoline; and when you foot it all up it runs into the neighborhood of something like $10,000 a year—more than you get to serve your district in Congress; and yet the manager of this place had never conducted a hotel or a boarding house or a rooming house or an apartment house a day in her life until she took charge of this place.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Who is it?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not acquainted with the lady. She is a Miss James.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Is she a relative of somebody high up in the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not know about that.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. I think you will find out that she is.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, here is the record. I will quote from it directly. I have practiced law for a good while in my life, and my memory used to be a good deal better than it is now. I am not going to misquote if I know it. Here is the testimony taken by the Senate committee on page 439 of part 2 of the hearings. According to the testimony of the vice president of this institution they were paying men down there $58 a day and other men $33 a day. If you will figure it up, you will find that the $58-a-day man gets over $18,000 and the other fellow over $10,000 a year, counting only working days.

I want to tell you something else. I have spoken of it before, but I want to call it again to the attention of the House, inasmuch as some gentlemen may not have heard it. When the armistice was signed and the Senate had passed a resolution over there to wipe this whole concern out of existence—and that is a mistake we made in not doing it; I can see it now—we thought at that time some of the projects ought to be finished, because the Government could save more by selling them as a finished proposition than it could by selling them in their then unfinished condition; and so the House committee, acting upon the matter, expressed their view that 22 of these projects ought to be finished and the others ought not to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, then, instead of their doing that, we told them when they were before us that they were practically a defunct institution, and that they were going out of business, and we wanted them to economize and cut down their force and get rid of it and close it out; but instead of doing that they held a meeting five months after the armistice was signed, and raised the salaries of nearly every high official in the bureau. They raised one fellow's salary from $5,000 to $12,000 a year and dated it back 30 days, so that he got the benefit of a month more.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman incorporate the raises or increases of salaries in his remarks?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will endeavor to do so; but many of them are incorporated in the report of the chairman.

Mr. CANDLER. What were the duties of this man whose salary was raised as stated?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. He claimed to be an auditor. I think he was simply a bookkeeper. He claimed to be an auditor. But, whatever he was, this increase was an outrage on the people and an unwarranted raid on the Treasury.

The rooms down at the Plaza dormitories, single rooms to accommodate one person, built out of hollow tiling and generally cheap construction, what do you suppose they cost per room? They cost $1,500 a room, every one of them. So we paid out $1,500 down there to house one war worker.

Oh, my friends, do you know how much they are going to lose on the navy-yard proposition, how much the Government stands to and is bound to lose? Just about $800,000. You can not sell it to-day for anything on earth except for the value of the naked land, and you can not get near what they paid for that.

Why, let me tell you one thing. In buying this land down here—and the real estate people came before us and boasted that they were costing the Government nothing, that they were dollar-a-year people—yet the evidence shows that when they went to buy one little piece of land down here by the navy yard that cost $5,200, although they had a big real estate division in the bureau, and although God knows Washington is full of real estate men, crowded with them, yet they sent all the way to Toledo, Ohio, and brought a man here to buy that land. [Laughter.] And they paid him $50 a day and his expenses. And that is not all. The record shows this. After they got him here they then employed another man in Washington, a real estate man, to assist him in buying that little piece of land, and they paid him $500 to assist the Toledo fellow.

Now, my friends, those are the things that have been going on from one end to the other, and the record is full of them. I am not charging anybody here with getting something that did not belong to them, nor am I charging a criminal offense, but I am simply pointing out the very peculiar methods of these patriotic business people as shown by the record.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Who is responsible? The gentleman referred to them as "they." Who are they?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am speaking of the bureau officials in charge down there. I will say that when the bill originally passed the House it charged the Secretary of Labor with the performance of this duty. The Senate amended the bill and charged the President with it, substituted the President. The President, under the Overman Act, delegated it to the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Labor created this bureau. Now, they have gone on here with all these people, with this enormous expense, and long after the armistice they gave up the modest quarters they occupied down on G Street, and they went down to where the Railroad Administration was, I think it is Thirteenth and F or somewhere along there, and rented the whole floor of a magnificent office building for which they are paying $2,200 a year.

I am told they have got their names up on the doors, on these frosted glass panes, and this is "Private" and that is "Private," and so forth; and it is harder for a Member of Congress to get in there than it is for him to see some of these assistant secretaries that you sometimes run up against. [Laughter.] Every one of them has got a private secretary. Why, this little man McCumber down there, who is vice president, I am told has got two private secretaries. A salary of $6,000 a year and two secretaries, in addition to all the stenographers and clerks and everything of that kind that they have got around there to wind up a dead concern.

Oh, this thing ought to be wiped off the earth and these people ought to be put out of business. My fellow Members of Congress this is an outrage upon the American people. I do not know just who is responsible for it. I hope it will be found out. I hope that it will go to the Department of Justice and that a thorough and full investigation may be made, and the man or men who are responsible for it ought to be punished, and punished to the full extent of the law. [Applause.]

You talk about Bolshevism and anarchy and all that sort of thing in this country. I am here to tell you that these are the things that create anarchy. [Applause.] These are the things that make Bolshevists in this country of ours, and it ought to be stopped.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman from Florida if he is opposed to the continuance of the war-workers' homes in the city of Washington under the present arrangement under which they are being conducted; and if so, why? And what would become of the thousands of young women who are there now, who could find no other place to go?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just stated—probably the gentleman was not here—that I am in favor of conducting them just so long as they are necessary and just so long as they do not cost the Government money to run them. As long as those two things concur they ought to be run; but I submit that we have got no power and no right under the Constitution to take money out of the taxpayers of this country to run hotels. If it is necessary as a war emergency, yes; we have got the right to do anything; but when that ceases we have not the right to do it.

Mr. GARD. Who is to determine the necessity for the continuance of these projects, such as the Plaza buildings?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will tell you what the committee agreed was the proper thing to do. The bill provides that all of the property now in the District of Columbia is to be turned over to the Public Building Commission created by Congress. I suppose they would be all right to determine it. The only objection I had to putting it in their hands was the fact that I happen to be a member of that commission, but I knew of no other place where it could be put. I have no particular desire; in fact, I had rather forego my part of the obligation if it can be put somewhere else, but you remember it is the commission we created in the last Congress, composed of Senator SMOOT, Senator SWANSON, Mr. LANGLEY, myself, Mr. Elliott Woods, Mr. Wetmore, and Col. Ridley. I do think, as long as they have charge of all the building space in the District of Columbia belonging to or rented by the Government, that was the most appropriate body that I could find. If some gentleman can suggest some other authority, so far as I am concerned as one member of the committee, I will be glad to accept an amendment to put it somewhere else.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from Florida yield for another question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. BEE. If the expenditures for the erection of these Plaza buildings, for instance, have already been made, and these houses are now being conducted without expense to the Government upon a self-sustaining basis, does not the gentleman from Florida think that these young ladies ought to be allowed to continue to reside in these buildings under the circumstances?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have just said that I do.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman did not answer my question before.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes, I did; but let me answer it again.

Mr. BEE. All right, sir. That is the question I propounded.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I say that so long as the hotels can be run without expense to the Government, and so long as they are necessary for the uses of the Government, they ought to be run. Is that plain enough?

Mr. BEE. That is plain enough now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANGLEY. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to take a brief space of time to emphasize one or two points upon which the previous speaker has dwelt only briefly. Your committee, without a single exception, has been fully convinced that the House should pass this bill substantially as it is presented, in order that the whole subject may be placed in the hands of the Senate for further and final consideration; not final in the sense, of course, that our committee would not have its rights in conference in case the Senate should pass the bill in a different form. The Senate committee has been conducting an examination—or an investigation, if you please—into the affairs of the Housing Corporation. To us it seemed inadvisable that the House committee should take up a similar line of investigation. We have gone far enough, however, to convince every member of the committee, so far as I know, that this Housing Corporation ought to be absolutely wiped out of existence.

With the passage of this bill by the House the whole question can go into the hands of the Senate committee for such consideration beyond the provisions of the bill as the extended investigation of that committee may suggest.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Can the gentleman advise the committee from the investigation by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds whether or not this Government hotel on the Plaza is practically maintaining itself now?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I can not quote the figures on that point, because the investigation of that phase of the question was in the hands of others, members of the committee. Perhaps the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] or the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] can tell.

Mr. LANGLEY. My information is that it is not self-sustaining, and the one reason why it is not self-sustaining is the excessive overhead charges due to high salaries.

Mr. RAKER. The only reason is the high salaries of certain officials?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that it can be made self-sustaining?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is our judgment, that it can be, and the actual cost of the enterprise should be paid by those who receive the benefits.

Mr. RAKER. On page 3 you direct that this property shall be turned over to the Public Building Commission, and that they may use it as they decide. Ought not the committee to place an amendment in the bill providing that the Public Building Commission shall use the property as it is now being used until the emergency for the war workers is over, so that there will be no question about it?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, it is the full purpose of the members of the committee that these buildings shall be used for the girls so long as there is necessity for it. And if there be any doubt with reference to that matter the committee would gladly entertain any sort of amendment that would remove the doubt on that subject. The gentleman who drafted the bill has gone over the question carefully, and we have not received any information from any source whatever to indicate that there was any disposition on the part of any members of the commission to indicate that they would act otherwise than as suggested.

Mr. RAKER. One further short question: Would the gentleman advise the committee, approximately, how many war workers are now in these buildings?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I do not have the figures at this moment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think about 1,800.

Mr. DYER. There are as many as the buildings will permit the housing of, and there are others on the waiting list.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I think the gentleman is mistaken; there are 688 vacancies.

Mr. DYER. Where?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Down by the navy yard.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. We are talking about the Plaza, and I think the question related to the buildings on the Plaza.

Now, gentlemen, let us go back to what I was seeking to emphasize. With all the information that the Senate investigation will throw on this subject, they will then be in a position to make such amendments to the bill, if any, as conditions may suggest. The House by passing this bill expresses its judgment as to the absolute elimination of the Housing Corporation, with the ugly record that has been sketched by the gentleman from Florida. That is the point that urges us to the passage of this bill.

Now, with reference to the girls. Gentlemen, would you imagine for a moment that any member of that Public Building Commission would be so indifferent to the needs of the Government, so indifferent to the proper care for the girls who are occupying those buildings, as to turn them out into the street? No; that is an unthinkable proposition. I know, Mr. Chairman, some people have come to the committee greatly agitated; they have called upon individual members of the committee in the midst of the agitation, saying that this horrible thing or that horrible thing would happen to these girls. The committee expects, and the committee is willing to provide by specific words of law, that no such misfortune shall come to them. At the same time your committee feels under obligation to bring these facts to the House and say that the people who have been derelict in the discharge of public duty, as many of these people in charge of the Housing Corporation have been, shall be immediately separated from the Government business and, if possible, never be permitted to return to it.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I have but a short time remaining.

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks that the Public Building Commission has power to lease and run the buildings on the Plaza as a hotel, as it is now being run, if the property is turned over to them?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The bill provides that the property shall be turned over to the Treasury Department, that has the facilities for handling public property, so that it will realize a better price for it when it comes to dispose of it in the market than any other agency that I know of within the scope of the Government.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the members of the Public Building Commission, acting in conjunction in reference to the disposition of this property, when its need for the use of these girls shall have ceased, will be able to work out that problem more effectively and economically than any other method that has been suggested.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I do.

Mr. BEE. I want to say to the gentleman from Nebraska that the only interest I have is in preserving these housing places for the young women. I want to ask with reference to that portion of section 4, on page 3, which directs that all personal property in the District of Columbia acquired under said acts shall be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be disposed of "in the same manner as provided in section 2 for the sale of property outside the District of Columbia." What does that mean, and will that effect a disposition of any personal property in these housing institutions that now take care of these girls?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary would then have full discretion to proceed to the disposition of this property, and as the interests of the Government would suggest, and, I take it, the interest of the girls occupying these places. These buildings were provided for the accommodation of the war workers, and when accommodations for war workers shall be no longer needed the Secretary of the Treasury, in the discharge of his duties, would dispose of that property in regular order.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. There seems to be an impression that this bill refers directly to the Plaza. How many other properties and what other properties does the Government own under this act?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The property that was mentioned at the navy yard, and I am not able to give an inventory of all the property, aside from these that have been referred to, and these are the principal tracts that we have had under consideration.

Mr. LANGLEY. In the District of Columbia?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. There were three projects down there—seven blocks—and on those seven blocks there were 14 dormitories constructed, with 618 rooms, at the cost of $864,000.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The actual cost, extravagant in the extreme, the absolute thoughtlessness in regard to the expenditure of public money, stand out in clear relief on every page of this record, and I wish that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] had taken all of my time and gone forward to an enumeration of the other facts which I know are in his possession and which he is able to recite in precise form, project by project, because he has been identified with this legislation from its inception up to this time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to proceed further and consume the time of the committee, but simply want to emphasize again that here is an opportunity for the House to clear itself of this whole business and put it into the hands of the committee of investigation in the Senate, so that it will have even larger power to go on, with the knowledge that the House stands ready to wipe out this Housing Corporation and make provisions on an economic basis for the proper care of the girls and the proper disposition of public property.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time, and if no one desires to be heard in opposition to the bill, I suggest that we proceed with the reading of it under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman desire to be heard in opposition to the bill? [After a pause.] The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of getting some information from the chairman of the committee. I notice by the provisions of the bill that the housing act is repealed, and that would wipe out all right to function under it, and that all of the property is to be delivered to the Public Building Commission.

Mr. LANGLEY. In the District of Columbia; yes.

Mr. RAKER. The rest of the real estate and the personal property is to be sold. The personal property in the District of Columbia is to be sold, the same as outside property. Does the Public Building Commission have power under the act creating it to retain these buildings and run them for hotel purposes, as they are being run now?

Mr. LANGLEY. As I recall the provisions of the act creating that commission, I think they have general supervision of the disposition of all space in public buildings in the District of Columbia.

Mr. RAKER. On page 3, section 4, of the bill, providing that the buildings shall be turned over to the Public Building Commission, there is no provision that the furniture and equipment, which is personal property, may be retained; but section 4 provides that all lands within the District of Columbia acquired under the act still vacant and not occupied and all personal property in the District of Columbia acquired under the act shall be transferred and sold. That would take the personal property out of these buildings, would it not?

Mr. LANGLEY. A representative of the Treasury Department is a member of that commission, and I do not apprehend that any question of that kind would arise.

Mr. RAKER. He is a member of the commission, but if he has no authority to hold the property, he or the commission would be accused of violating the law. If he is to sell the personal property, that will include the carpets, the chairs, the tables, and everything that we have bought for and now in the Government hotels on the Plaza near the Union Station, and there could be nothing retained.

Mr. LANGLEY. The bill unquestionably gives the Secretary that power and perhaps there ought to be some qualification of that language.

Mr. RAKER. That being the case, must not the Secretary take all of this personal property immediately and dispose of it?

Mr. LANGLEY. He has supervision of it, but he does not have to sell it at once, or at least I do not think he would.

Mr. RAKER. But the bill provides that he shall sell it; that he shall dispose of it in the same manner as in section 2 for the sale of property outside of the District of Columbia. If this bill be passed without an amendment reserving the right to retain the personal property in these buildings that have been used, then it becomes the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to take possession of the property and sell it. Then not only the 800 rooms at the navy yard but this large hotel, with some 2,000 or more rooms, on the Plaza will be stripped of all of the personal property, and we will have them on our hands without use, and in addition to that the war workers will be turned out of their homes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Does not the gentleman feel that any transfer would be an improvement over the present conditions?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so, but that is not the point. If they strip the buildings they can not be used. The Secretary of the Treasury is compelled to sell the property, namely, the furniture, the capets, chairs, stands, bed clothing, and everything in those dormitories on the Plaza under this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman understands, of course, that these buildings are going to be torn down some day?

Mr. RAKER. I understand it was never understood they were to be permanent. But until torn down let us use them and the equipment now in the buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will say to the gentleman I think the committee would have no objection to any amendment that will make this bill clearer.

Mr. RAKER. I am satisfied of that.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to say to the gentleman that what we are trying to accomplish is a betterment of existing conditions in these Plaza buildings, and if the gentleman has an amendment which he thinks will relieve any difficulty that might arise under the bill as now phrased the committee would be glad to consider it.

Mr. RAKER. There is the question of high-priced salaries which has been spoken of; they ought to be discharged, and in addition to that there should not be any doubt as to who is responsible, who has allowed this sort of thing to go on, who has permitted this work. There must be some one?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; and we are going to get rid of them.

Mr. RAKER. Has the committee found out who they are?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. We know in a general way about conditions——

Mr. RAKER. Is it possible that a committee with 23 members, with hearings and investigations that have gone into the facts, can not tell the House and the country who is the responsible head of this very bad mismanagement, not only mismanagement but upon its face worse than that?

Mr. LANGLEY. That was all very clearly stated by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. RAKER. But he did not name the parties.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say the Senate committee is engaged in a very full investigation of this matter. I understand it is their purpose if anything criminal appears to report it to the Department of Justice, and now I do not think it would be very proper for me to undertake to name this man, that man, or the other man as doing anything criminal.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I did not have the pleasure of hearing all of the gentleman's remarks. If I understand the purpose of this bill, it is to transfer the custodianship of this property from the people who now hold it in charge to what is known as the Public Building Commission, composed of the Senator from Utah, the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, that commission is composed of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and some others. I was just wondering if the Congress of the United States was going into the boarding house business.

Mr. LANGLEY. We have been in it, and we want to get out of it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I stated, and I think I am stating the view of the committee, that it is our idea that these buildings ought to be run just so long as they are necessary for the uses of the Government and just so long as they do not cost the Government money. Those two things should concur. Whenever either of them ceases to exist, they ought to go out of business.

But now, I will say to the gentleman, the purpose of this legislation is to put all the property outside the District of Columbia—and they have it all over this country—in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. They have the means there for the holding and disposition of real estate, and so forth, and it will not cost anything extra for them to handle it and thereby get rid of these enormous salaries which are being paid down there in keeping it up. Then, as to the dormitories here in the District of Columbia, we propose to turn them over to the Public Building Commission and let them take charge of them.

Mr. GARNER. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Florida and the gentleman from Kentucky in making this arrangement with reference to putting outside property in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I can not extend this same congratulation as to the jurisdiction over the property of the District of Columbia, and that we should have a congressional commission having charge of a lot of boarding houses and make it a Congressman's duties to look after that is so silly that I think it ought all to be put under the Secretary of the Treasury, and an amendment ought to be offered to transfer the District property to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me suggest to the gentleman to prepare an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask that I have one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the attention of the committee to section 3, turning over to this commission all the buildings. Now look at it and see what it means. Not a carpet, not a chair, not a bed, no personal property. Section 4 directs that the property unoccupied and all personal property to be sold, therefore immediately upon the passage of this act every building on the Plaza is stripped from cellar to garret and there will not be a thing in there to accommodate these women who are there now. I want to call attention to that so as to make an amendment to provide for it, and I know the committee will do it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3371. An act authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the White River; and

S. 3418. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the lading or unlading vessels at night, the preliminary entry of vessels, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1911.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. This bill transfers the control of the property to the Secretary of the Treasury and it designates the Public Building Commission as an agency to manage these affairs for the accommodation of the war workers while the necessity exists, as explained by the gentleman from Florida. The provision that the Secretary of the Treasury shall proceed immediately to sell the property, both real and personal, does not, to my understanding of the subject as discussed in the committee, contemplate immediate sale and transfer of these buildings. It does mean that without delay the Secretary of the Treasury will proceed to a sale of the property. If he finds one piece of property that the Government has no further use for, he will sell it at once.

And the word "immediately," as I understood it in the discussion in the committee, had the meaning that when we reached the point when these buildings are no longer needed for the accommodation of the girls, he will then dispose of that property.

Mr. RAKER. In reading section 2 of the bill, all of the property, real and personal, is to be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury; that is, outside of the District.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Within the District.

Mr. RAKER. I have referred to that in the District.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. This bill relates to property within the District.

Mr. RAKER. And without, too. It says within and outside of the District.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am discussing the proposition here as relating to these girls.

Mr. RAKER. Where is there in the bill the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to hold this property and use it?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the practice of the department through a series of years brings to me an explanation of some terms in this bill in a satisfactory manner. I recall several instances in which similar directions were given to the Treasury Department to proceed immediately in the sale of property, and it took in some cases several years to dispose of the property. If the Government had one building that it did not need and it could receive a satisfactory price for it, it disposed of it. If another building was in use by the Government pending the completion of a new building, for instance, that building was retained until the Government had its accommodations in the new quarters. Under those circumstances the Secretary of the Treasury would exercise such discretion as the public service would require. But he proceeds immediately, he does not wait a year to begin on the property that is not in use or is not needed for continued use, but takes it up as public necessity requires.

Mr. RAKER. This bill does not authorize and determine whether it should be for public use or not. On line 6, page 2, it says that the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately proceed to sell the same.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Proceed in the manner which I have indicated.

Mr. RAKER. Both personal and real property.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I have no objection to the elimination of that word if in the judgment of the members of the committee it ought to be erased, but, to my mind, I see the way perfectly clear in the light and practice of the department through a series of years to do the work as I have suggested.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this bill, as I understand it, this property that is to be used will be turned over to the Public Building Commission?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. They will have the supervision of its use at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DOWELL. But under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury has no discretion whatever. He will have to turn it over to this commission under this bill, and would have, as I view it, to transfer the property to the commission.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Gentlemen of the committee, I have noticed with a good deal of interest the discussion in this House as to whether the Government of the United States ought to maintain housing buildings for war workers in the District of Columbia. We do not hear any discussion as to the Government of the United States extending its agencies all over this broad land, into every character of enterprise and industry, but when it is suggested that the young women who have been gathered here from all over this country, away from their homes and in foreign surroundings, and have become in a measure the wards of this Government during their occupancy of those positions, gentlemen hold up their hands in holy horror, aghast at the suggestion that the Government should take any interest in them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BEE. With pleasure, if it does not take too much time.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know how many of the young women to whom he refers are the wards of the Government? What percentage of the total number of those employed here are being taken care of in these houses?

Mr. BEE. I will answer the gentleman from Illinois by saying a very small proportion of them.

Mr. MADDEN. So, as a matter of fact, the complaints the gentleman makes——

Mr. BEE. I do not make the complaint in that light. I would be glad if all of them were housed properly. I am speaking of a condition that presents itself, and not a theory, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. Here are the facts. I suppose there has been extravagance and waste in the building of the property and in its management. The only interest I have is that as long as the necessity continues there shall be proper maintenance and support. It is my information that they are being maintained now at cost, regardless of the other expenses connected with it. But here is what is in my mind: What is the necessity, when the Senate is investigating this matter, for the House to pass a bill of this character? The only suggestion I make about this housing proposition is that as long as the houses are self-sustaining and as long as the emergency exists we should afford these young ladies the housing facilities into which they have already been placed. And I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that applications are on file there by the thousands. My last information is that applications made last August are just now being considered, showing that if they are not in there it is because there are not sufficient accommodations.

I want to suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] that if the language means anything it means, under section 4, that as soon as this bill passes it shall immediately become the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, not in his discretion, I will say to my friend from Nebraska, but it shall become his duty immediately, to sell the personal property referred to in section 2 of this act. In other words, as the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has well said, you will strip these buildings of every piece of furniture from cellar to garret, and the Government will have empty buildings on their hands, and these young women who are now being housed by the Government will be turned into the streets without any notice.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I wanted to say to the gentleman that I think if he will look up the law he will probably find the Public Building Commission to-day, if they were so disposed, could take charge of those buildings and put offices in there.

Mr. BEE. Then if that is the case it is not necessary to pass this legislation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The Public Building Commission, as the gentleman knows, was created by Congress and given absolute control over the buildings in the District of Columbia owned and rented by the Government, and they can move one office out, and they can go down under that law to-day and move the Treasury Department out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEE. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] and that of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] to section 2. According to the English language as I understand it—and I claim no special mastery of it except as the average citizen has—section 2 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately proceed to sell all real and personal property outside of the District of Columbia acquired under this act, and section 4 requires that "all land within the District of Columbia, acquired under the said acts and which is still vacant and unimproved, and all personal property in said District of Columbia acquired under said acts shall, by the Secretary of Labor, be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury," who shall at once dispose of it in the manner provided in section 2.

Unless you amend that, it is going to result in the stripping of these buildings and the winding up of these institutions before the time that the emergency for which they were created has passed away, and that emergency continues as long as this Government continues in operation war agencies and continues the hand of the Government in the exercise and control of its citizenship in war measures and war agencies. These departments must accommodate young women to do this war work, and as long as you have done that and have put your hand to the plow, you ought not to turn back and turn them into the street.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last four words.

Mr. HICKS. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee [Mr. LANGLEY] or the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] a question or two in regard to a matter which is not quite clear to my mind. In lines 13 and 14, on page 2, where reference is made to the sale of these houses, provision is made that "not more than one house shall be sold to the same person." Does that prohibition apply to all the property that is going to be disposed of?

Mr. LANGLEY. I wish that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], the author of the bill, would answer that question.

Mr. HICKS. The question refers to page 2, lines 13 and 14, the proviso, that says that "not more than one house shall be sold to the same person." Does that apply to all the property that we are going to dispose of?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That applies to all the residences.

Mr. HICKS. I imagined that that was what it applied to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will let me call his attention to it, I may say that the Secretary of the Treasury shall give the preference to individuals who desire to purchase the same for use as a home, but not more than one house shall be sold to the same person.

Mr. HICKS. One more question.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Very well.

Mr. HICKS. Is that word "person" a generic term? For instance, suppose there were two men who were associated together who wanted to buy a double house. Could those two men buy it on joint account?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think so.

Mr. HICKS. They would not be prohibited because they are two persons from buying under those conditions?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think not.

Mr. HICKS. Suppose there should be some sort of a cooperative society in which men are interested, as many of them are. They undoubtedly would be prohibited from purchasing homes under this proviso, would they not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Why?

Mr. HICKS. Because they are not individuals. For instance, suppose some association which is formed for the betterment of the condition of people, and four or five houses would be desired for purchase.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They might buy one house. We wanted to prevent this property from falling into the hands of corporations and other speculators. These houses were built for homes, and we wanted them to be given to individual citizens for homes.

Mr. HICKS. I agree with the gentleman as to the risk of these houses falling into the hands of speculators, and I am opposed to it, but I am thinking of some cooperative society that would have the benefit of these people at heart, that might desire to come in and purchase these buildings for people to be used as homes, on part-payment plan, and dispose of them afterwards to some of their members.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They would do that for the profit there was in it, of course.

Mr. HICKS. They might be cooperative.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. You do not find many of them in life.

Mr. HICKS. They might be cooperative, just the same, and not entirely speculative.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That could be managed if they wanted to buy them for a number of individuals. They could do it in the name of individuals, any philanthropic concern that was really engaged in this sort of business.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DOWELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages in writing from the President were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had, on December 17, 1919, approved and signed joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 260. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1919; and

H. R. 9822. An act to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, if that is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARD. I am interested in having the committee understand the correct legal attitude we now find ourselves in by reason of the existing law in connection with the bill which we are now considering. Particularly I desire to call the attention of the committee who have the bill in charge to this phase: The section which we have been discussing, rather in an informal way, relates to the act authorizing the President to provide housing for war needs. The next section, section 2, provides "that the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury," and so forth. The act under which we are now operating and the act which is referred to in the first section conferred upon the President, for the purpose of providing housing and transportation and other duties, the power to buy and the power to maintain and the power to sell certain real estate. The second section of this act provides that that entire act and all acts amendatory thereof be repealed.

Now, if that be done, there is in the existing bill, so far as I can see, no authority to direct a final report. There is nothing which provides for the transfer from the President to the Secretary of Labor, if such transfer has been made, of the power to do the things which the Congress said the President might do, and the President alone might do, in this act of May 16, 1918. In other words, the law provides that the President may have this power. Section 2 of this act provides that the Secretary of Labor shall turn these buildings back to the Secretary of the Treasury. Nowhere does it appear in this act how the property gets into the hands of the Secretary of Labor, so that he may turn it back.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would state to the gentleman that the original law as it finally passed turned this duty over to the President.

Mr. GARD. Yes; that is what I have been saying.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, the President, acting under the Overman Act, passed it on to the Secretary of Labor. He had the right to do that.

Mr. GARD. I understand that. I have been saying that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. So that, as the President was acting under the law, the Secretary of Labor is really the man who has been executing this law. That is why we direct him to deliver it to the Secretary of the Treasury, because he is legally in possession of it.

Mr. GARD. But the thing which it seems to me should be safeguarded is the fact that the Congress has given the power to the President.

The action of Congress has vested the power in the President. Now for the purpose of regulation, for the purpose of carrying out the duty which it is manifest the President could not carry out in person, he has, under the so-called Overman Act, transferred that power to the Secretary of Labor. But in this act should we not refer to the President, to whom the power was given to carry on these enterprises, instead of referring solely to the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman admits that the President had the power under the law to delegate that duty to the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. GARD. I do not know whether it should be called a delegation or not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I believe the language of the law is that he may transfer it from one department to another.

Mr. GARD. Under the Overman Act.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, having transferred it, having vested in the Secretary of Labor the power to execute the law, we find the Secretary of Labor in possession of this property. We desire to turn it over to the Secretary of the Treasury. The President has nothing to do with it, because under the law which we passed he has divested himself of all authority in connection with it.

Mr. GARD. There is nothing in the bill that shows that. That is why I am asking this.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is in the law.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it the President acted, and as he was authorized under the law to do, turned the administration of the housing law over to the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. LANGLEY. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. The Secretary of Labor has functioned, and if the statements of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] are true, and I have no doubt they are, the Secretary of Labor in functioning is officially responsible for the present condition, and it was because of failure through ignorance or otherwise, or lack of proper care, that we have the present existing conditions, especially so far as the property in the District of Columbia is concerned. Now, having failed, you propose that these duties shall be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury. I am ready to vote to do that, or to make some other disposition of this property, and I take it that Congress alone has the power by legislation to make that disposition. It seems that under this bill it is to go to this building commission, composed in part of Members of Congress, so far as the property in the District of Columbia is concerned. I suppose the working member of the commission under that arrangement would be Mr. Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I know that is what is in the minds of some members of the commission.

Mr. CANNON. There is power to do that anyhow.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; they have abundant power, and the commission relies greatly upon the experience and good judgment of Mr. Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol.

Mr. CANNON. He will still have it in the event that this bill should be passed. Now, I have had some experience with the Superintendent of the Capitol. In one sense I am responsible for these congressional office buildings.

The House built one office building and the Senate followed suit. I was the chairman of the commission for the construction of the House Office Building. There were two other members of the commission—the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Richardson, a very competent man, now dead, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Hepburn, also now dead. Well, they were not much wiser concerning the technicalities of architectural construction than I was. So having the power to do so, we put the whole construction duty upon the Superintendent of the Capitol. We said to him very frankly: "We are not builders. You have a free hand. If you need architects, if you need anybody to protect you—and you probably will need many experts in the construction of this building, in the matters of heat, light, drainage, and the purchase of the site and all that kind of thing—we are not practical men in these matters and we put them all under your charge. Your own reputation is at stake, and you have our reputation at stake."

Mr. LANGLEY. I think I ought to say for the Public Building Commission that in the matter of technical details the congressional personnel of the commission relies largely upon the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, the Superintendent of the Capitol, and the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds. That is the general policy of the commission and I think it is a wise one.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Now, they are talking about turning out the girls. There are 1,600 of them housed in the Plaza dormitories. How many others are there who are on all fours with those housed who are not housed in these Government-owned buildings—I suppose 10,000?

Mr. LANGLEY. More than that number, I think.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says more than that. Now, if gentlemen are correct in their statements, these Plaza buildings, which are right under our observation here, are not self-sustaining in their administration, and, in any event, they dwindle into insignificance when you consider that there has been nearly $100,000,000 expended in housing all over the country. That being so, this little local matter here becomes negligible. But they being under our very eyes, the debate has been about the girls, about whether they are to be turned out or not. Well, if it is a good thing now, in a time when peace approaches, I am content to agree with the gentleman and say that these buildings should be utilized as long as we need them. God knows they will be torn down sometime, I hope, because we condemned that property when it was in private ownership, and tore down the houses that were on it, and the property has been paid for, so that we might have an extension of the Capitol grounds between this and the Union Station. But that is in the future.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], who is on this commission, said that the Government having built and furnished these houses, he is quite willing to have them utilized as long as their use is necessary and self-sustaining, and I have no doubt such action will be had. I say again, as I understand the situation, we are agreed that these buildings, having been built and furnished, and that would include repairs, they should be devoted to the housing of these war workers so long as with frugal administration the expenses of running them are paid by those who occupy them.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois has brought up that point, because he expresses exactly the purpose of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There is and has been a widespread misapprehension as to the purpose of this legislation. The committee has no intention of turning these girls out of these Plaza buildings, but, on the contrary, its earnest desire is to better their condition and to secure for them decent and courteous consideration, to which they are just as much entitled as the favored ones who get big salaries and have sumptuous conveniences that the poor and less fortunate Government workers can not have.

Mr. CANNON. I am inclined to think, taking the whole bill together, that there would be no embarrassment so far as the girls are concerned. I think the bill on the whole is wise. There is a hundred million dollars in buildings, scattered all over the country, of this kind, and I presume if we have been unfortunate in the District we have been unfortunate all over the country. There is one thing to guard against as to this hundred millions of housing property outside of the District, and that is to see that speculators do not combine and buy wholesale all of this property that we own all over the United States. The bill wisely has a provision that there shall be only one building sold to one individual. I for one am not afraid of the provisions of the bill. It means good administration on the part of the Treasury Department, and in the District on the part of the Public Building Commission. There may have been other abuses, and in the fullness of time they will come to light, and they are coming to light, and should be a warning against any further fraud.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. In extending my remarks, which the House has so kindly granted me the privilege of doing, I shall cite a number of instances in other parts of the country where there has been waste and extravagance in the expenditure of this money.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know anything about it except from the report of the committee, and I am quite sure that we ought to do something, and do it without damaging the worthy people who are the beneficiaries at this time of these buildings between the Capitol and the station. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a question. What effect will the repeal of this act have on all the employees of the Housing Bureau of the Department of Labor; will they be immediately discharged?

Mr. LANGLEY. The Secretary of the Treasury is given broad discretion under the provisions of this bill. I do not think that would be the effect of it, but I do think that they ought to be dismissed as fast as they can be spared.

Mr. DALLINGER. The gentleman would not be in favor of turning out all these employees at once, would he?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; I would if their services are not required.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I hope I shall not use all of the time, and I may use more. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I do not know just what effect the first section of this bill repealing the law relating to housing corporations will have. I do not know whether any member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds knows; but if so, I would like to get that information. Congress passed a law authorizing the President to provide housing facilities for war needs. Under that law the President was given authority and given the money. I suppose from the title "United States Housing Corporation" the same procedure was taken in that case as was taken in a number of other cases whereby the corporation was created, not by act of Congress, but by application to one of the States.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is correct.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the housing corporation was created by act of Congress and we should repeal the act of Congress that would end the corporation. It could not even do what is provided for in section 5 of this bill—that is, transfer the title—because the law was repealed, and that ended the corporation. If we repeal the law authorizing the President to proceed, how far does that affect the State corporation which, by reason of the law we passed, has been created? The corporation, I suppose, employs the ones who are serving it. The corporation has the title, I presume, to the personal property—I do not know who has title to the real estate. Does anybody know?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It seems that they have taken the title in different ways. The housing corporation has taken some titles, some of them have been taken in the name of the Government, and some perhaps by the Secretary of Labor; I am not sure about that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Here is a State corporation created—I do not know upon whose application, but possibly by direction indirectly of the President. What authority have we over that corporation? We can not repeal the charter of the corporation. We can repeal the act under which the President was directed, in effect, to provide a method of housing war workers, but if anybody can explain just what effect this bill will have if it becomes a law I have not yet heard the explanation. I am in favor of the bill, but hope that before it becomes a law it will be rewritten.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman raises a question about section 5. The gentleman is right; the Housing Corporation is created under the power granted by Congress. That power was granted in an appropriation bill, and the purpose, as I understood it, was that this bureau might use the fund as a revolving fund, so that it would not have to come to Congress every time it wanted an appropriation. Now, it strikes me that if we repeal this act which the corporation was created under, an act of Congress——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The corporation was not created under an act of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. By virtue of an act of Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; because of an act of Congress, but by virtue of a law of Delaware or some other State.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They could not have incorporated as they did without Congress having consented in that appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whether they could or could not, they would not, anyway—I presume they could not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If we repeal the act, of course that puts the corporation out of business, as the gentleman states, but we provide here for certain things that the corporation must do to wind up its affairs.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. One of two things is certain. Either the authority of the corporation to act is dead when this becomes a law or it is not dead. That is perfectly patent.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Dead, except for certain purposes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the question. It is either dead or it is not dead. If it is dead, then it can not convey title to property.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me to say to him this. The act repealing the law which does away with the corporation directs the corporation to perform certain acts in furtherance of its liquidation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman thinks it advisable, we can easily add a proviso to this section 5, giving the corporation express authority to make these deeds, but it seems to me that the act as it is does that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will not say that the gentleman from Florida is not correct. I am calling attention to what seems to be an anomalous provision. It may be perfectly proper, but it is rather strange to absolutely repeal an authority in one section and then in the next section direct the exercise of that same authority.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit just one word further?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We are directing them to do an act which effectuates their dissolution.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is certainly proper to direct them to do that act. I read the other day a report from somebody—I think the Interior Department—in reference to these buildings down here the other side of the old Maltby Building, which we condemned a long time ago for the purpose of extending the Capitol Grounds to the Union Station. A portion of the ground that was condemned was built upon by the United States Housing Corporation. There are a number of old residences which were temporarily turned over to the United States Housing Corporation during the war for some period. That corporation expended, according to this report, something in the neighborhood, I think, over $35,000 in repairing those buildings. The rent from the buildings is about $2,000 a year. I do not know how it will strike landlords, but it struck me as a rather extravagant proposition to expend $35,000 repairing buildings which rent for only $2,000 a year. One who constructed a new building costing $35,000 would expect to receive a good deal more than $2,000 a year gross rental. And I have been somewhat impressed with the idea that this, along with others, is one of the things that grew up in the time of war that was inclined to be somewhat, if not very, extravagant.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will tell the House what his idea is of the effect of section 1 repealing entirely the act upon the appropriation for the current fiscal year for the work?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I discussed that for about five minutes, and made up my mind that I did not know what the effect was and that I could not get any clear explanation of it from anyone else.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would it meet the gentleman's objection if in section 5 there was a provision stating that the title to the property acquired by the corporation upon its dissolution should vest in the United States?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It probably would. I only instanced that one case. If the effect of repealing the corporation is to end it, what becomes of the employees of the corporation? They are not transferred by this bill with the property to the Treasury Department. What becomes of any appropriations which they have had? The appropriations are not authorized to be expended by anyone else. What authority will there be to repair the buildings? What authority will there be if it is necessary to purchase furniture? I do not know, and therefore I call attention to it, intending myself to vote for the bill, but hoping that if the bill becomes a law it will have been rewritten before it does so become a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. The language of the original bill with which the gentleman no doubt is familiar——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. WALSH. Is as follows:

That the President may exercise any power or discretion herein granted, and may enter into any arrangement or contract incidental thereto, through such agency or agencies as he may create or designate.

Would the gentleman think that under that authorization the President might enter into an arrangement with the corporation which might not be terminated by act of Congress repealing the law which gave him that authority?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not undertake to say, but if the authorization is repealed and the repeal ends the authority, then the bill is not sufficiently explicit, because these people must have authority to wind up the affairs of the corporation in some way. It is not sufficient to merely say that title to certain property shall be conveyed to the Secretary of the Treasury or that possession shall be delivered to the building commission.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask the gentleman's attention to this, and also the attention of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]: Why would it not be well to strike out the first section and insert a proviso at the end of the bill that all acts inconsistent with the provisions of the bill shall be repealed, and a further section providing for the winding up of the affairs of the corporation? I direct my inquiry more particularly to the gentleman from Illinois, of course, because he has the floor, and I would like to know what he would think of that kind of an amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Personally I am inclined to think that if I get a chance I shall vote to repeal the law. I wanted to speak for a moment in reference to the provisions in sections 3 and 4 of the bill, if I may under my pro forma amendment, having the floor.

I happened to be here at the end of last July—I was not here very much during the special session—just after this bill was introduced, and I was waited upon, I suppose like all the rest of the Members of Congress were, by some ladies who said they came from my district—I do not know whether they did or not; I do not recall—in reference to this bill, on the theory it was designed to close up these buildings on the Plaza and turn the girls out, and I said to the ladies who waited upon me that while it might possibly be a good thing, it would not be done, and they need have no worry about it. Now, I take it that it is clearly the intention of the Congress, as long as there is lack of room in Washington, and I suppose that still exists, that we will not order closed up those dwellings which were erected and used by the Government to house the war workers. When the lack of room ends, either by the increase of dwelling accommodations in Washington or by the reduction of the number of useless employees in Washington, it will be time enough then to provide for closing those buildings. That brings me to the provisions of this bill. This bill first turns over all real estate and personal property outside the District of Columbia to the Treasury Department. Then it directs that the possession of houses in the District of Columbia shall be turned over to the Public Building Commission, and then it provides in section 4 that all the land which has been purchased within the District and all of the personal property shall be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, it is perfectly patent to anyone that if we turn these Plaza buildings over to some other governmental agency than the Housing Corporation and intend them to be occupied, we must at the same time turn over to the same agency the personal property which is necessary for the occupancy, and it would not do to turn the buildings over to the Public Building Commission and turn the furniture over to the Secretary of the Treasury. They must both be turned over to the same governmental agency, although the bill goes still further than that in section 4, in that it provides that the furniture shall be sold, disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury, so that he would have no option even to leave it in the possession of the Building Commission. I had intended, if no one else did, to offer an amendment to section 3, to include that all personal property therein or connected therewith be turned over to the building commission if the buildings are to be turned over to the building commission. Then I would like to make an inquiry. The bill apparently directs that the Secretary of the Treasury shall at once proceed to sell the real estate outside the District of Columbia. Well, they used to have a habit down there of proceeding immediately when you said anything of that kind. Now, the bill further provides that the title to the real estate purchased in the District of Columbia shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury in the same manner. Now, there was land down here that was purchased for the care of persons at the navy yard; I do not know what use is being made of it; but I would like to inquire, for information, whether the purpose is to order all of that property immediately sold?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will state to the gentleman that that is my idea of what was intended. The property is being used for absolutely nothing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I did not know whether it was occupied or not.

Mr. BEE. Would I interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It will not interrupt me at all.

Mr. BEE. I was very much impressed with the argument of the gentleman as to the immediate effect of section 1 as a repealing nature. In that connection I would like his opinion as to the effect of this act, coupled with the provision in section 1 of the act of 1918, which provides that these housing facilities shall be only during the continuation of the present war, and if we repeal that law, what does it mean here in this law as to the continuation of these housing facilities?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I should say——

Mr. BEE. I would like the gentleman's opinion on that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That it is perfectly obvious that would not affect the situation as to anything except the houses in the District of Columbia, because the act directs that all the other property be disposed of at once. It will repeal that provision which apparently would automatically close up those dormitories on the Plaza.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman, then, think that would be the effect of section 1 of this act——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think that would be one effect.

Mr. BEE (continuing). Of automatically closing up——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; it would automatically keep them open.

Mr. BEE. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. After the close of the war.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does it make any difference, in the gentleman's opinion, if the Housing Corporation is one in which the only stockholder is the Government of the United States or some official and this act and its provisions would only be operating, so to speak, upon the Government official who had been designated by the President to become the sole stockholder of the corporation?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I called attention to what I did for this reason: This is not a law yet. When you have a law written you must construe it, but before the law is written you can very often obviate any difficulty as to construction by covering the points that would otherwise be of doubtful construction. I think before this becomes a law—and I think something like it ought to become a law—it will be wise—and it still has to pass another body and doubtless have to go to conference—to have the form of it very carefully considered in connection with those questions. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I desire to say very much about the bill, but I think I may very properly call the attention of the committee to the fact that it has been long understood by most people in the United States that conditions here in Washington are not what they ought to be. Before the war I think the departments had altogether about 30,000—maybe a few more than that—clerks in all branches of the service here, and now I think we have about 110,000, and I think everybody concedes that those are about 40,000 more than we ought to have even under present conditions. I do not have to remind gentlemen here that not long since, during the early part of this year, we went so far as to appropriate to pay the transportation charge to their homes of those who were willing to separate themselves from the service, and after all we could not get them separated from the service.

I think I do not overstate the case when I say that anybody can go into any department of the Government at any working hour of the day and find not to exceed 1 out of every 10 at work. I have taken the trouble to go through some of these departments myself, not on a fishing expedition or on a detective tour, but when having business in the departments, and I could not close my eyes to the situation which stood out prominently before me. I have gone through branches of the service when I have had come in view at least a thousand people between the hours of 10 o'clock and 11 o'clock in the morning—and one would suppose that would be the busiest hour of the day. I have gone into rooms where they had groups of stenographers, anywhere from 5 to 10 in a group, with as many machines as they had stenographers, but not a single machine at work and not a stenographer doing anything.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit right there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman that a Government employee told me a few days ago that he went into a certain place to get a paper copied, and he was informed by a lady there that she did not have the time, but to go into the sewing room and find out about it, and he went in there and found them all sewing.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, that is better than to have them idle entirely, because it kept them out of mischief. And then I found not only the stenographers in these groups were not doing work, but in some other rooms the ordinary clerks that are supposed to be employed, but are idle, and you find as you move along through the departments a bureau head here and there—and he is on the pay roll, too—is not working.

You find them sometimes with their feet on the desk, sometimes with somebody else who has his feet on the desk, but rarely ever at work. It is unfortunate that such a condition should exist right under the dome of the Capitol, so to speak.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Does the gentleman think there will be any diminution of employees in these departments as long as Congress continues to appropriate money for them?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I was going to get to that. We tried to separate them from the departments some time since——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. And we did appropriate the money to pay railroad fares home, as I said, and some few, who wanted to go home on a pleasure trip, perhaps, took advantage of the situation, but had themselves inducted back into the service as soon as they returned. They tell me that the heads of the departments are not anxious to reduce the volume of business which they think they are conducting in each of these bureaus. Each one wants his bureau to be considered of greater importance than the bureau of his neighbor. That is a very laudable ambition. But when we take into consideration the fact that we have beyond any question $3,000,000,000 of deficit facing the American people, with estimates for appropriations for the coming current fiscal year 1921 amounting to about $5,000,000,000 more, and faced with the further fact that the estimating officers of the departments have failed to estimate for $75,000,000 already appropriated out of the Federal Treasury for cooperation with the States in the construction of roads, and that they failed to estimate for the $250,000,000 already obligated for the payment of increased compensation to Federal employees, and that they have failed to estimate for $400,000,000 that is bound to be paid to the railroads before they are turned over to their owners, and for other unknown millions, you can see that we have not only the $5,000,000,000 proposed as the current expenses for the coming fiscal year, added to the $3,000,000,000 of a deficit, but substantially $1,000,000,000 more, making $9,000,000,000. And we have of anticipated revenue from all sources, with as much as an 80 per cent tax on the incomes of the American people in many cases, only $5,300,000,000 to meet the $9,000,000,000 of obligations, leaving at least $3,700,000,000 to be met at the end of the next fiscal year, assuming that we live within the revenues.

And yet we continue to submit to the iniquity of permitting the bureau chiefs in every department of the Government to laugh up their sleeves at the Congress of the United States and insist that they appropriate money to maintain an army of unemployed clerks, and we find it necessary, as the result of that, to impose unheard-of obligations in the form of taxes on the already overloaded and overburdened American people. Yet, in spite of that, we doubt the propriety of economizing in any way.

This bill proposes to economize in a given branch of the Government. It may well be said that there may be doubt as to the wisdom of turning the girls out that are in these Government houses; that while they are in the employ of the Government they should be housed. There is no doubt about that. We should look to their comfort and their welfare, moral and otherwise. But my judgment is that most of these girls ought to be home under the influence of their mothers and fathers, where they belong. [Applause.] That is where they should have been long since. And my remedy for the effective enforcement of the proposition involved in this bill is to reduce the appropriations for clerical force in the departments of the Government to the extent that will enable us to tear the buildings down, because of no further need for their use, and then we will be able, Mr. CLARK, to remedy the evil that you have so well described and bring back the Government to its normal condition and ancient glory, and not be the laughingstock of all the clerks in the departments, who say without any hesitation that all they need to do is to hang up their hats in the departments and walk the streets; that there is nothing else for them to do in nine cases out of ten. And so we have an obligation, and that obligation can not be fulfilled until we have refused to appropriate the money for at least 40,000 idle people in these departments. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the laudable desire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to economize in Government expenditures, but while he was so eloquently discoursing about the prospective deficit that confronts the Government and the serious need for conserving our revenues, I brought to mind a large amount of correspondence that I have been receiving in the last two or three days concerning the Madden bill, which the gentleman from Illinois recently introduced, to reduce the rate of postage on first-class mail matter in city delivery offices and by rural carriers from 2 cents to 1 cent.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? That is a reduction of taxation.

Mr. BLACK. Wait until I finish this statement.

If the postal revenues will bear a reduction of that kind, then, of course, the bill might well be enacted into law. But, knowing as I do the condition of the postal revenues and trying always to be frank with my people, I have replied at once that I was against the bill, and have told them why.

Now, let us see why I am against that bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say that in response to an inquiry from the Post Office Committee, the Postmaster General has reported that the adoption of that bill will not reduce the revenues to exceed, in the first year, more than $14,000,000, and it relieves the taxpayers all over the United States of a vast amount of money.

Mr. BLACK. All right.

Mr. MADDEN. Then he says another thing. He did not say this officially, but he stated to me only a day or two since that the postal revenues, since the reduction of 3-cent postage rates down to 2 cents, are increasing, on the average, at least in Chicago and New York, about 30 per cent.

Mr. BLACK. Well, I will give the gentleman the figures in a moment on the average increase throughout the country. Now, let me finish. The gentleman says that the Postmaster General has stated in a communication that the passage of that bill will only lop off $14,000,000 from the postal revenues. Well, let us see whether we have got that $14,000,000 to spare.

The Post Office appropriation bill which was passed in March carried an aggregate of $401,000,000 for the fiscal year 1920. In November we passed a joint resolution further increasing the salaries of all the postal employees. That will add $38,000,000 more, and that will make an aggregate appropriation for this year of around $440,000,000.

Now, what are the estimated revenues? The postal revenues for 1919, the year that ended June 30, 1919, were $364,000,000. The average increase in the Postal Service from year to year is about 6 per cent, and, based upon that average increase, the revenues for this year would certainly not aggregate more than $390,000,000, and that would leave us with a deficit of $50,000,000.

But I am glad to state that on account of the unprecedented prosperity of the country the receipts are exceeding what they usually are, and the First Assistant Postmaster General estimates that for this year the increase will be much larger than usual, but making the most liberal allowances for this fact the figures will not exceed an aggregate revenue of more than $415,000,000 into the Postal Service, and that will leave a deficit of at least $25,000,000, due to the increase in salary.

Now, if the bill that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has introduced should become a law, notwithstanding his plea for economy, notwithstanding his professed love for the Public Treasury, he will add $15,000,000 more to the deficit and thereby have a total deficit of $40,000,000, and I think the gentleman's attitude is entirely inconsistent with his own proposed legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I followed carefully the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] with respect to this bill, being greatly interested in it and appreciating the difficulty of interpretation that might exist with reference to some of the phrases and language contained in this bill. Since then we have drifted somewhat afield in the discussion of other matters. But I want to call the attention of the committee back again to what is the legislative matter now before the committee.

I suggest to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], who has supported the bill so ably, that a few corrections in the bill would make these matters perhaps quite clear and free from objection. In the first section of the bill I suggest that after the word "repeal" he add the words, "reserving, however, in the President and every agency created under or because of said act the power to carry out the provisions of this act which require the performance of any duty." That makes a repeal of the act that is perfect, insomuch as this reservation is within the power that Congress possesses to qualify the repeal and preserve authority to carry out the provisions of the new legislation.

I was impressed with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] when he called our attention to section 2, which provides that "the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed," and so forth. It is quite true that nowhere in this legislation does it appear why we should direct the Secretary of Labor. In the prior act of Congress which created this situation we authorized the President of the United States, and I would therefore suggest that if the whole of the seventh line on page 1 and the words "hereby directed" in the eighth line on the same page be stricken out and the following language substituted we would put the bill in conformity with prior legislation and make the subject matter clearer and be dealing with the persons whom we authorized to enter upon this war housing work:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to direct the Secretary of Labor and every other agency created by virtue of the act approved May 16, 1918, and all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury—

And so forth. That would make a harmonious connection between this legislation and the prior legislation and a perfect bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. CARAWAY. If it will not interrupt the gentleman's argument, he was talking about his suggested amendment in section 2, "that the President is hereby requested to direct." Suppose he refused to do it. You would then have an act without any power to enforce it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not think that that criticism of the language is proper, in view of the form of legislation that is recognized when addressing the President of the United States. Congress always requests the President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But when Congress addresses any department head of the Government Congress always directs. Now, we are exercising the highest function of our congressional duty when we say "request the President of the United States to direct" these things to be done, and I am sure that the President of the United States will comply with such a request. It would be an astounding proposition to suppose that he would not do so.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me just a moment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. So far as I am concerned, as one member of the committee, I agree absolutely with the gentleman's first proposition. I think it would make it very much clearer and better in every way, but on the last proposition I want to submit this to the gentleman: We did clothe the President with this duty, but there was in existence at that time the Overman Act, which gave the President plenary power to transfer from one department to another such duties as were defined in that law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There was in existence the Overman Act, which allowed this transfer, even from the Executive himself to a department or from one department to another. Now, the President acted under that, which was our law, and transferred it to the Secretary of Labor. Therefore were we not after that dealing with the Secretary of Labor instead of the President?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think not. When you clothed the Executive with power to do these things in the Overman Act, you did not clothe him with any other or greater power than you did in the act of May 16, 1918, and therefore I think the point of the gentleman from Ohio, Judge GARD, was properly made, and we are putting this language in harmonious relationship with the previous legislation and making it clear what the intent is, and to what this subject that we are now legislating upon relates.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is it not the gentleman's belief that the word "amendatory," as applicable to this act, can have no application to an outside act like the Overman Act, extending power?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; certainly not. Now, proceeding a little further, I would amend section 4 by adding, in line 14 on page 3, the following language:

> Except such personal property as may be needed by the Public Building Commission for the care and management and use of the houses transferred to it under section 3.

That, I think, would cover the difficulty of leaving these houses stripped, and therefore unproductive, or requiring the Building Commission to furnish them, in order to keep them occupied for the use of the employees of the Government, for whose use they are intended. Those words added would give the Public Building Commission authority to receive and hold whatever furniture was necessary for the continued use of these properties until the time of their final disposition and the end of them in every way.

Now, I would also suggest that at the end of section 6 a provision be inserted for the merging into the Treasury of all unexpended appropriations made under the act of March 6, 1918.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Have we not already a general provision for that?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Where?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For the covering of that money into the Treasury.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; in the general law. I think there is a general law on the statute books now which provides for that very thing.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I wish to answer the gentleman from Florida first. I would say that such a provision as this would be pertinent in this bill, and that it provides for the application of the amendment contained in section 1, which is to retain in the President and his agencies the power to perform any duty required under this bill, and to transfer or direct it to be merged into the Treasury would, perhaps, be one of those powers, although I do not insist—I only suggest that that might complete and perfect the bill.

Now, if these amendments were added I would feel that the difficulties and doubtful interpretations would be largely removed. For myself I am inclined to the view that under the terms of this bill the interpretation of this law would be that those powers were impliedly reserved, because by the bill, which repeals those acts, we impose these duties, and therefore it will be a fair interpretation to say that the power is reserved. But to make it clear we ought to put this language into the bill, and then there can be no question about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have not time to yield, because my time has expired. Otherwise I would be glad to yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The covering of unexpended balances into the Treasury is specifically provided for by permanent law. Any money in any annual appropriation now existing that is not required by permanent provisions of law after the passage of this bill will remain in the Treasury and can not be paid out. It would be a mistake to require all of these balances to be covered into the Treasury immediately upon the passage of this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In view of the gentleman's statement I withdraw the suggestion about which, as I wished to make it clear to the committee, I was not definitely assured in my own mind. If that is the law that these balances will be turned into the Treasury in due time, then there is no necessity for adding that suggested amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. May I add a brief explanation? If we should cover them all into the Treasury immediately upon the repeal of this law, some expenditures properly authorized before the repeal could not be made without the renewal of the appropriation by Congress.

Suppose that an item of $100 on salaries or supplies had been properly incurred before the passage of the bill, and the bill should carry the unexpended balance back into the Treasury. No money could be advanced for such payment. An auditor could state an account for that amount, because an appropriation had previously existed for its payment, but it had gone back into the Treasury. That would lay the foundation of a claim. On the other hand, unless Congress should reappropriate that money that item could not be paid. At the end of the third year, two years following the period for which the appropriation was available, all unexpended balances will go back into the Treasury under the operation of permanent law. In the meantime these unexpended balances would remain to liquidate any legal obligation on the part of the Government under that appropriation. If it should remain as it is, the whole question of accounting will take the regular course and be closed out without any loss or liability to anyone.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I realize that one who did not help to frame a bill ought to be very cautious about suggesting changes. I want, however, to discuss briefly two suggestions by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], for whose judgment I have the most profound respect.

His first suggested change in section 1, leaving to the President and existing agencies the power to carry out the provisions of this act, would conflict with section 3, which undertakes to transfer certain powers to the Public Building Commission to continue the operation of these so-called Government hotels. Then the suggested change in section 2, that the President is requested to direct the Secretary of Labor to transfer certain property to the commission, or to sell certain property, might, I think, reasonably be answered by the Secretary of Labor by saying, if the language were changed that way, that he had no power to do it, because he was created an agent of the Government to perform certain duties. Unless we empower him to perform these acts prescribed by this bill he is without power either to sell this property or to dispose of it in any way. He would be correct, because he holds this property now merely as an agent. And I think that merely requesting the President to direct him would not empower him to do these things. Therefore I think that change would be unhappy.

I want to suggest two changes, if I may do it. In section 3, which is the one I apprehend will be most fought over, because the friends of the Government hotels want to be certain that the young ladies occupying them will not be summarily turned out of doors, I would suggest that in line 5, after the word "Congress," you insert this language: "and furnishings thereof." And then strike out the remainder of the paragraph and say "that the Public Building Commission is hereby empowered"—not directed or authorized, because we want to leave it to their discretion—"that they are hereby empowered to continue the operation of these so-called Government Plaza hotels as long as the necessity for them shall continue, not to exceed one year after the termination of the present emergency."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. After the passage of this act.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the emergency may last much longer than one year after the passage of this act. We had an illustration of that thing yesterday when my good friend Col. BUTLER was trying to extricate himself from a difficulty he got into in an appropriation bill by limiting the provision to October 1, 1919.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to suggest that that would leave it uncertain when the bureau would be terminated.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Public Building Commission would terminate it when the use of the hotels for war workers terminated.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman says the Public Building Commission should have the power to determine when——

Mr. CARAWAY. The power to continue the use of these hotels as long as the necessity requires, not to exceed a year after the termination of the present emergency.

I have another suggestion, possibly more verbal than real, but it seems to be an inelegant use of language. Page 2, line 14, after the words "Provided further," you have this language:

That in the sales of such residences the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, sell the same partly on credit to citizens of the United States who are heads of families and who shall furnish satisfactory evidence showing that they are law-abiding, industrious, and patriotic, and that they intend in good faith to occupy the same with their families.

That means either one of two things. It means that they must be sold to a group of citizens or to one citizen who has more than one family. There may be people who might qualify under one or the other of the categories but would not want so to register themselves in order to buy a Government building. [Laughter.] Therefore I would suggest that it be amended to read in this way: "That in the sale of such residences the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, sell the same partly on credit, and in such case the sale shall be to a citizen of the United States who is the head of a family, and who is law-abiding, industrious, and patriotic, and who in good faith intends to occupy said premises as his residence."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think we have had liberal general debate, and I ask unanimous consent that debate be now closed on the first paragraph of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate be closed on the first paragraph of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the amendment I suggested to the first paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 1, line 6, after the word "repealed," insert "reserving, however, in the President and every agency created under or because of said act the power to carry out the provisions of this act requiring the performance of any duty."

Mr. LANGLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Debate having been closed on the first paragraph by unanimous consent, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not be discussed. It can be offered and voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman is correct; debate is closed on the first paragraph. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania) there were 6 ayes and 35 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DALLINGER: Strike out all of section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury a detailed statement showing all real and personal property outside of the District of Columbia which has been acquired under and by virtue of said acts and which is now owned by the United States; and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately proceed to sell the same, after due advertisement as provided by law, and to cover the proceeds into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts and to make report of such sales to Congress: Provided, That in all sales of residences the Secretary of the Treasury shall give the preference in the right to purchase to individuals who bona fide desire to purchase the same for use as a home, but not more than one house shall be sold to the same person: Provided further, That in the sales of such residences the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, sell the same partly on credit to citizens of the United States who are heads of families and furnish testimonials showing that they are law-abiding, industrious, and patriotic, and that they intend in good faith to occupy the same with their families; in all cases of such credit sales, reserving title in the United States until fully paid for, or conveying title to the purchaser and taking from him a mortgage upon the property to secure the deferred payments.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "States," insert "and also showing use to which each piece of property has been applied up to the armistice and thereafter."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the words "bona fide."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment before we get to line 10, which makes it possible to offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, by way of substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEE: Page 2, line 10, strike out all of section 2 after the word "Congress," in line 10.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order until the committee amendment, which is a perfecting amendment, has been acted upon.

Mr. BEE. The reason I offer it at this time is because there is a committee amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee amendments will be acted upon before the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman's amendment may be offered, but the committee amendments will be voted upon first. The question is on the second committee amendment, striking out the words "bona fide," in line 12.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, before the word "furnish," insert the words "who shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, strike out the word "testimonials" and insert "satisfactory evidence."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, strike out the word "families" and insert the word "families" and a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, apparently the committee has stricken out the word "families," and has reinserted it again with a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the word "families" was stricken out and the word "families" and a semicolon inserted. It is the understanding of the Chair that amendments in the change of the punctuation usually comprehend the striking out or insertion of a word.

Mr. LANGLEY. That was the view of the committee.

Mr. RAKER. It seems to me that we would have inserted the punctuation just as well as to strike out the word and insert it. The matter is immaterial, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the first amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEE: Page, 2, line 7, after the word "same," insert the words "partly for cash and partly for credit, upon terms and conditions to be prescribed by him."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to follow this amendment up by another amendment striking out all of the remainder of section 2, beginning on line 10, after the word "Congress," so that the section will read, in part:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately proceed to sell the same, partly for cash and partly for credit, upon terms and conditions to be prescribed by him, after due advertisement, as provided by law, and to cover the proceeds into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and to make report of such sales to Congress.

I suggest that we stop there, because if you go on with section 2 you find yourself in a maze and labyrinth of instructions and directions, that the Secretary shall give the right of preference to individuals who desire to purchase for a home, who do not desire more than one home, and who are the heads of families, and who show that they are law-abiding, industrious, and patriotic, and that they intend to occupy the same with their families, and so forth, all of which I submit is covered by prescribing that the sale shall be partly by cash and partly for credit, upon terms and conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Does not the gentleman think that this bill should have a provision which will prevent all of these properties, scattered throughout the United States, from falling into the hands of a combination of capitalists?

Mr. BEE. Yes; I do; and that is the reason I think, if you put the provision in there "upon terms and conditions to be prescribed by him," without prescribing the various conditions that this section does, that it will answer the purpose. With all due deference to the committee and the authors of the provision, I would suggest that, in my judgment, it is rather awkwardly drawn.

By prescribing the various things which I have enumerated you are putting limitations and conditions into a deed which in some States would not convey a fee simple title under the laws of those States; but which would leave parties in a state of uncertainty and doubt. For that reason it occurred to me that if you leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury, let him sell partly for cash and partly for credit, and let him prescribe the conditions under which sales shall be made, you have everything that is in the section after the word "Congress" in line 10.

Mr. LAYTON. Why should not Congress make the provisions?

Mr. BEE. If Congress is going to enter a large field like this, there will be no limitation upon what will hereafter be done.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman think that these conditions will be set out in the deeds made?

Mr. BEE. No. It is not necessary to set them out.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But the gentleman made the statement that we were going to attach those conditions to the deed.

Mr. BEE. I said if he followed this he would have to attach them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no.

Mr. BEE. I submit that if you put this into the organic law of this land you put a burden upon every purchaser of showing that he is a good American citizen; that he is law-abiding and patriotic.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We are not considering the drafting of an organic law.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman knows that upon this point the Secretary's decision, if you satisfy him, is final, because it is in his discretion; and the gentleman knows that all these conditions attached—that the man shall be the head of a family, that he shall be an American citizen, and so forth, are in our homestead laws. Now, we all know—I think the gentleman from Texas knows—that if we permit the Secretary under general terms to sell it, some real estate company will buy all of it up and peddle it out at 1,000 per cent profit. Since the Government has gone to the expense of these buildings, why shall not we say they shall become the homes of patriotic, industrious American citizens?

Mr. BEE. Because I think when you make provisions that under the terms and conditions prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury the Secretary of the Treasury will attach the conditions without having that written into the law by Congress and it will not fall into the hands of speculators and capitalists. If I thought it would for one minute, I would say to this House I would not only make this provision strong, but add more to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "the," insert "President direct the" and strike out "be, and he is hereby, directed."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment that I offered is one that seeks to carry into legislative effect the undoubted purpose of the Congress of the United States in providing that the President of the United States should have this power of providing the houses as a military necessity during our war emergency. It carries into this act the provision as amended that the President direct the Secretary of Labor to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, and so forth, the lease of all this property. As the bill now stands we have reference here to the Secretary of Labor without any connection save the connection which those who speak in favor of the bill contend for, that the amendatory act takes care of it by reason of the inclusion of the so-called Overman Act. Now, I do not believe that is true, and I think to make it clear we should have the expression which I have indicated, that the President directs the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to, for this reason: We have got a system of laws, and while I know it is frequently a very violent presumption it is the presumption that the lawmakers know the law——

Mr. CARAWAY. I never heard that advanced before.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, it is the presumption that we know what the law is, else we would not undertake to legislate. I know it is a very violent presumption, but it is the presumption. Now, then, we have got what we know as the Overman Act, which gives the President the power to transfer the performance of duties from one department to another, even from the Executive, so when we passed the original act vesting this power in the President and the President under the terms of the Overman Act vested it in the Secretary of Labor, the President's action made the Secretary of Labor the agency through which this law was being executed just as effectual in my judgment as if it had remained in the bill that way. We are not dealing with the President, but we are dealing with the Secretary of Labor, who carried the law into execution and who has attempted to enforce it, and we do not want any amendment here that is going to complicate matters at all. As has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, this bill will probably go to conference and we will have the benefit of the advice of another body, and it will eventualy be whipped into shape, and the committee would much prefer it remaining as it is now in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. I have certain other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "outside of the District of Columbia."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask, in connection with that, that the Clerk be permited to read the second amendment which I have on that page beginning with line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the other amendment be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "shall," strike out the word "immediately" and insert the words "in his discretion as the public use and benefit may require."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to speak on both of these amendments so as to conserve a little time. The first amendment I have offered strikes out the words "outside the District of Columbia." If that amendment is accepted it makes unnecessary section 3 and section 4. My belief about the expression of the bill is that there should be no difference as to the right and power to sell Government property. The Secretary of the Treasury has a supervising architect and a corps of architects and has always had the jurisdiction and control of public buildings and now sells, with the approval of the Congress, all Government buildings which are not necessary. I can not see why the provision should not with equal force apply to property within the District of Columbia. The old law provides that the Public Building Commission is created in this language—

With a view to the control and allotment of space in owned or leased Government buildings in the District of Columbia a Public Building Commission is organized.

There is nowhere in the Public Building Commission any power of purchase or any power of sale, merely a sort of supervision in the control and management and allotment of space in the buildings, and I concur in the idea expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], that the Secretary of the Treasury or the man who has all these buildings under his control should have them continued in his control, whether they be without the District of Columbia or within the District of Columbia.

Another suggestion I have—and this applies to the second amendment—is this: The language carried in the bill we are now considering, on lines 6 and 7, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately proceed to sell the same. Now, there has been some question raised as to what that means, whether it is an absolute direction of immediate action on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury regardless of existing conditions or public necessities or not. In order to clear that up I have offered the amendment I proposed, which carries the idea that the Secretary of the Treasury be given invested discretion for the public use and benefit to sell this property—the property turned over to him from the Secretary of Labor. So that, with the two amendments I have—and, of course, I realize they will have to be voted on separately—the first proposition is to make the Secretary of the Treasury the sole comptroller—if one may use that phrase—of the sale of the property, whether it be within or without the District of Columbia. This would eliminate the placing of this duty of maintaining property in the District of Columbia on the Public Building Commission, which, as the gentleman from Texas has said, would take away from them the many arduous duties of taking care of these hotels and such other buildings that we now have in the District of Columbia, occupied by those who are employed in the District.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Certainly, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I ask for information. The gentleman, I take it, is of the opinion that if the language which he has offered be substituted and section 3 is stricken out of the bill, the Secretary of the Treasury would have the power not only to sell the buildings but to operate them?

Mr. GARD. Yes, sir. Sections 3 and 4 can be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, section 4 is another matter entirely; but section 3 has reference to buildings controlled by the Public Building Commission?

Mr. GARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is the gentleman of the opinion that if the buildings be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Building Commission they would not have the authority to conduct a boarding house?

Mr. GARD. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Housing Commission has authority, or, at least, it does it.

Mr. GARD. That power was given to it in its incorporation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, will the Secretary of the Treasury have that power? All we say is that the property is to be turned over to him, and he, in his discretion, will sell it. Will he meanwhile have the power to run a boarding house?

Mr. GARD. It was my purpose to include, in addition to the power of sale in the Secretary of the Treasury, the power of carrying on the existing authority of the Housing Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, just one word about this: If this amendment be adopted, it will absolutely emasculate the bill. Now, we have provided in the section there that all of this property outside of the District of Columbia is to be turned over to the Secretary, and that he has to immediately sell it. The object the committee had in view with reference to that was to get rid of this property at the earliest practicable day and save the enormous charges that are now being paid. A lot of this property is not rented; a lot of it is in charge of custodians; and, of course, if it is turned over to the Treasury they will have to have custodians to take charge of it and preserve it, and probably it will have to be insured, unless the Government is carrying its own insurance. And the object of the committee was to close up this whole affair at the very earliest possible day and get the cash in the Treasury and stand our loss, whatever it is. And these amendments would mean simply to prolong it. I hope they will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 6, after the word "shall," strike out the word "immediately" and insert: "in his discretion, as the public use and benefit may require."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CARAWAY: Page 2, line 14, after the words "Provided further," strike out all down to the semicolon in line 21 and insert: "That in the sale of said residences the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, sell said residences partly on credits, but in such case the sale shall be to a citizen of the United States and who is the head of a family, and to one only who can show by satisfactory evidence that he is law-abiding, industrious, and patriotic, and that in good faith he intends to occupy said premises with his family as his residence."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the language of the amendment I think improves to some extent the language of the bill, and, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to it, and I think the committee will be glad to accept it.

Mr. RAKER and Mr. DOWELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] is recognized.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand exactly the reading of this amendment, but if I heard it correctly it only limits the sales to citizens of the United States when the sales were upon credit. If that is the language of the amendment, it should not be adopted, and I ask for a further reading of it in order to ascertain its exact meaning.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the word "such" in the amendment, it occurs to me, may be misinterpreted. I suggest that the word "such" be stricken out and the word "all" be inserted, so that it will include all sales.

Mr. CARAWAY. This provision, Mr. Chairman, was dealing only with those properties that were residential and that were to be sold partly on credit, dealing with that particular class of property that could be used as residential property, and not dealing with the large part of the property, such as dormitories and that kind of thing.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand; but in the text of the bill it is provided that all sales of residences shall be so and so. This provides that in the discretion of the Secretary he may sell on credit.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; some of them.

Mr. DOWELL. And such sales shall be to citizens. Now, it seems to me that all sales should be to American citizens.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman from Iowa will pardon me, this was dealing only with the property that was to be sold as residences and sold partly on credit. If he undertook to avail himself of this right given to him by the bill—to sell residence property on credit, it must be only to American citizens who are industrious and hard working and patriotic.

Mr. DOWELL. How about the other property?

Mr. CARAWAY. This does not interfere with what he shall do with the other property. This only undertakes to limit his discretion if he undertakes to sell residential property on credit.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the reading of the amendment I could see no practical distinction between the amendment and the language of the bill except in the matter of number. The language of the bill is in the plural number, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is in the singular. Is there any distinction between the two?

Mr. CARAWAY. It was only to clarify the language. It was only with a view to improving the language.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I would say myself that the plural number was better than the singular.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me, it would seem, as the language is now used, that the Secretary of the Treasury could only sell to groups of people.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what the language means.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course the gentleman from Arkansas is frequently a dictator as to the meaning of language. I am only an humble follower in the matter of language. Still I have had about as much experience in dealing with language as has the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not mean to be discourteous.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I thought the gentleman was intentionally discourteous.

Mr. CARAWAY. It was not so intended. Possibly it sounded that way.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The plural form usually and in this case is better than the singular form, although it probably makes no difference in the effect, the law providing that in either case the singular shall be taken as plural and the plural as singular.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment by striking out the words "that he is law-abiding, industrious, patriotic, and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. The Clerk will first report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER to the amendment offered by Mr. CARAWAY: Strike out the words in the amendment "that he is law-abiding, industrious, patriotic, and."

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the first place, it must be sold to a citizen of the United States; second, he must be the head of a family; and, third, he must intend to reside on the property.

Now, why put in the language that is in the amendment, that there must be satisfactory evidence that he is a law-abiding citizen, that he is industrious, and that he is patriotic?

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. Now, we have an American citizen, with the presumption that he possesses all the qualifications that are attached to an American citizen. He buys and sells property in this country wherever he pleases, and here you have a little public property where a man must prove by evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In just a moment. Then I will yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman had any property of his own and was going to sell it on credit, would he want to know that the man to whom he sold it was honest and hard working and a good citizen?

Mr. RAKER. That is presumed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would the gentleman from California presume it or ask about it?

Mr. RAKER. I would find out about those things.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought so.

Mr. RAKER. But we do not have a law of that kind on the sale of property to American citizens. The Secretary of the Treasury or his agent, when he sells it, would meet the man, and on investigation he would know and become convinced that he is a law-abiding citizen.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. This whole bill is brought in here because an agency of the Government has abused its discretion and wasted millions of dollars. Why not, when we are trying to correct an abuse, make it impossible for another agency to abuse its discretion?

Mr. RAKER. That is all right; and yet there has not been any evidence presented as to who was the responsible party. I am not criticizing the committee for that, but clearly all under "the Department of Labor" does not seem to be in the category as suggested. I can not consent to any such statement. But here is an attempt to sell property, and you must present a certificate or evidence satisfactory to this official showing that the man is a law-abiding citizen. You must present evidence and bring witnesses to show that he is industrious, and you must present evidence and bring witnesses to show that he is patriotic.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. Then I will yield. But let me complete this. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury handles large volumes of property and disposes of them. None but an American citizen can buy. He must be a man of family. He must be intending to reside upon the property.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. As I read this bill, a single man or a single woman is barred from buying?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; they are barred.

Mr. CARAWAY. A man might be unmarried and still be the head of a family. The departments have construed that over and over again. The gentleman from California is a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, and knows that.

Mr. RAKER. In direct answer to the gentleman's question the head of a family might be a man whose wife may be dead, or he has brothers and sisters, or a mother or father, or other relatives living with him, dependent upon him. But my answer to the gentleman's question is that a single man or a single woman, if not included within the statement just made, no matter what the situation might be, would be inhibited from buying under this bill. That is all there is about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the Raker amendment to the Caraway amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has a perfecting amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 23, after the word "a," insert the word "first," and strike out the word "mortgage" and insert the word "lien"; line 24, strike out the period and insert the words "and such other security as he may deem proper," so that as amended the lines will read: "In all cases of such credit sales reserving the title in the United States until fully paid for, or conveying title to the purchaser and taking from him a first lien upon the property to secure the deferred payments, and such other security as he may deem proper."

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio the following substitute for the amendment which he has proposed: After the words "such credit sales," in line 21, strike out the words that follow to the end of the section, and insert:

He—

Referring to the Secretary of the Treasury—shall secure the deferred payments by reservation of the title or first lien on the property, and such other security as he may think proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will send his amendment to the desk. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. GARD: After the words "such credit sales," in line 21, strike out the words that follow to the end of the section, and insert the following: "He shall secure the deferred payments by reservation of the title or first lien on the property, and such other security as he may think proper."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offered, to which the gentleman from Virginia offers a substitute, was prepared in part by myself and partly by the gentleman from Virginia. Since, I think, his substitute expresses my idea better than my own amendment, I am very willing to have his substitute agreed to.

Mr. LANGLEY. The committee are entirely satisfied with the phraseology of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] to strike out all after the word "Congress," in line 10, down to the end of the section.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BUCHANAN: Page 2, amend, at the end of line 24, after the word "payments"——

The CHAIRMAN. The portion of the bill to which the gentleman offers his amendment has been changed by a previous amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. That language has been stricken out of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I did not know of that amendment. I would like to have my amendment follow at the end of the amendment which has been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will follow at the end of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BUCHANAN: Page 2, at the end of the section, insert:

"Provided further, That in no instance shall the Secretary of the Treasury sell such residences to such heads of families for a less amount than can be obtained therefor from other sources."

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If there are no further amendments to section 2 I ask unanimous consent to return to section 1 in order that Judge GRAHAM of Pennsylvania may offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to section 1 in order to enable the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, when we return to section 1 and the amendment is offered it will be subject to consideration, will it not?

Mr. LANGLEY. Not for debate, because debate has been closed.

Mr. RAKER. But when we get unanimous consent to return to that section to offer amendments we ought to be heard upon the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. There will be no debate on the amendment. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: After the word "repealed," in line 6, page 1, insert the following: "Reserving, however, in the President and every agency created under or because of said act power to carry out the provisions of this act which may require the execution and delivery of deeds or other papers and the transfer of property."

Mr. LANGLEY. That is all right, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Labor shall, immediately upon the passage of this act, deliver possession of all houses built in the District of Columbia under and by virtue of said acts to the Public Building Commission created by the Sixty-fifth Congress for such uses and purposes as said Public Building Commission may decide.

With the following committee amendment:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 3, line 4, after the word "acts," insert the words "and the furnishings therein."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that is quite broad enough? The language that I proposed to the same purpose was "and all personal property therein or connected therewith."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will accept that in lieu of this.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman that he offer that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and to offer this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks leave to withdraw the amendment just offered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 3, line 4, after the word "act," insert "and all personal property therein or connected therewith."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 5, after the word "Congress," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and said Public Building Commission is hereby empowered to continue the use of such buildings as Government hotels as long as, in its judgment, such use may be necessary, not to exceed one year after the termination of the present emergency."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for that amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. BLACK for the amendment of Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 3, line 5, after the word "Congress," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following language: "And provided, That the Government dormitories, erected on the site of the United States Plaza, shall be operated under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Capitol Buildings and Grounds for the purposes for which they are now used until otherwise ordered by Congress."

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman leaves in the bill, lines 4 and 5, "to the Public Building Commission, created by the act of the Sixty-fifth Congress."

Mr. BLACK. These buildings, together with the personal property contained in them, under the provisions of this section, are all turned over to the Public Building Commission. Then I have provided in the substitute which I have offered that the Government dormitories shall be operated by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds until Congress shall otherwise order.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. I would like to make my statement and then I will yield. The amendment that the gentleman from Florida has offered gives the Public Building Commission the discretion to operate these dormitories for such time as it may deem proper, not to exceed one year. If my substitute is adopted it would make it mandatory upon the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds to operate these Government dormitories until otherwise ordered by Congress.

There is a considerable difference between the two propositions. It might be that the commission would be hostile to the continued operation of the dormitories, and under the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Florida they would have the power to discontinue them immediately upon the final approval of this bill. As an original proposition, I do not know that I would advocate in a time of peace a Government-constructed dormitory to house Government workers. But they have all been constructed, the expenditure has already been made, and whatever extravagance there may have been in their construction is water which has already run over the wheel. They are there and are admirably equipped for the purposes for which they are used.

I have taken occasion to make some inspection of the accommodations they furnish, and I think all the Members who have done so will agree with me in my statement that they furnish an admirable place for comfortable housing of the young women in Washington who work for the Government. And they furnish it at a reasonable price, and the surroundings are wholesome.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think it might be possible to lease them for a term of years to be used for that purpose and at the expiration of that time to be torn down?

Mr. BLACK. I will say that that might be a proper thing to do, but my amendment provides that for the present they shall be operated as they are now operated until Congress otherwise orders. It may be entirely possible that upon investigation it could be found that private enterprise could operate these dormitories better and more economically than the Government is doing.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Would not the gentleman add to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York a provision that the parties who lease it should not profiteer on the girls, as the real-estate men and boarding-house keepers profiteer upon everybody else?

Mr. PLATT. It might be possible to lease them to cooperative associations.

Mr. BLACK. That proposition is not now before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have one minute more, as I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I ask that the gentleman from Texas have his time extended five minutes, as I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. I will yield first to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CURRY of California. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows that the Housing Corporation has already tried to lease the dormitories at Georgetown and the annex at Mare Island Navy Yard; that they have absolutely entered into an agreement to lease them to a firm of real-estate men for a term of five years. Immediately they started to put up the price of the rents, and I had to intercede with the committee in Congress and the Secretary of Labor to stop them. They have not rescinded it yet. Now, if Mr. Macomber would do that, he would lease these dormitories to anyone, so that he would be free of the care and trouble, and he would not care how much they made out of it.

Mr. BLACK. In reply to the gentleman from California, the provision I offer does not provide for a lease, but directs the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds to continue to operate these dormitories as they are now being operated until Congress by specific, definite legislation otherwise orders. Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I believe that I am in thorough harmony with the purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], but does not the gentleman think that there might be other possessions, other houses in the District besides those to which his amendment applies?

Mr. BLACK. There are none that I know of.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would it not be best and safest to insert the amendment of the gentleman after the word "decide" on line 6, page 3?

Mr. BLACK. I have no knowledge of any others in the District of Columbia and I think the language will cover the situation.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I was a little uncertain whether there was other property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLACK. I think not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There are some navy-yard dormitories.

Mr. BLACK. I would be very glad if we could get some information from the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There are dormitories down at the navy yard that have not been disposed of.

Mr. BLACK. Are they now being operated?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; but they are built and furnished.

Mr. BLACK. We do not want to operate them if they are not now being operated.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman's amendment would strike out the language—for such uses and purposes as said Public Building Commission may decide.

I think that ought to remain in there, so that it would apply to these other buildings, and if the gentleman will leave those words in and put his amendment in the nature of a proviso at the end of the paragraph, I think he would accomplish what he has in mind.

Mr. BLACK. I think it would, without in any way committing the Government to the operation of any dormitories it does not now operate, and I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be modified so as not to strike out the language referred to, and so that it may follow as a proviso after the last word in the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner in which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida: On page 3, line 6, after the word "decide," insert: "Provided, That the Government dormitories located and situated on Union Station Plaza shall be operated under the supervision of the Superintendent of Capitol Building and Grounds for the purposes for which they are now used until otherwise ordered by Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, why not leave it as it is? If there are 800 rooms at the navy yard already prepared for use, with the necessary equipment to allow 800 of the young men here in the service to occupy them who are now paying three or four prices for board, why should not the buildings be used in that way?

Mr. BLACK. I have left the amendment identically as I had it, except I merely modify it so as to move it down to the end of the section.

Mr. RAKER. And he does not change that?

Mr. BLACK. No.

Mr. RAKER. It has been in my mind all of the time that the supervision of these dormitories should be under the Superintendent of Capitol Building and Grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I want to say this, for I want the committee to understand what we are offering. We have offered an amendment to meet objections of some gentlemen and to show that we do not intend to put these girls out in the street. We leave it in the discretion of the Public Building Commission to say how long they shall be operated. If the amendment of the gentleman from Texas be adopted, that they shall be operated until Congress otherwise directs, they will be operated down there for years and years. There is no telling how long. No one can tell how long it will take to get a bill through Congress to repeal this. Our provision is that they shall be operated for at least one year longer.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In just a minute. For not exceeding one year after the emergency. It has been suggested that we change that, and I ask unanimous consent to change it so as to make it read for one year after the approval of the act. If the emergency exists, Congress can just as easily and more easily direct that they be carried on than Congress can pass a bill to repeal the provision of the law which the gentleman proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 3, line 5, after the word "Congress," strike out the remainder of the sentence and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And said Public Building Commission is hereby empowered to continue the use of such buildings as Government hotels as long as in its judgment said use may be necessary, not to exceed one year after the approval of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I had sent up an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida, which would have inserted the words which he has now added, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his amendment.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that there is a substitute already pending.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Then I ask to be recognized in opposition to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, Congress wants to get rid of the management of these hotels. The amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] limits the time these hotels can be operated to one year. They can not be operated longer than that, and they may be operated, in the discretion of the Public Building Commission, for a less period of time than that. The substitute for the amendment provides that they must be operated until by an act of Congress their operation is discontinued.

In other words, the substitute provides that we must go all over this question again at some time in the future. These are temporary buildings, and the time will come when the cost of repairs and maintenance will be enormous, and when that time comes their operation ought to be discontinued. It is hardly possible that that time will occur within one year from the present time. The committee has been so far unable to advise us definitely as to whether or not these buildings are now paying their way as they are operated. The chances are that if they are not now paying their way they soon will. They are splendidly conducted, as Members of this body know, and efficiently and economically managed. They ought not to be discontinued until they become a decided burden upon this Government, whether that is within one year or after one year from this time, and I shall propose an amendment, if the pending substitute is defeated, which I ask the Clerk to read now in my time for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY as a substitute to the pending substitute: Page 3, line 6, after the word "decide," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add the following: "Provided, That the dormitories now used as hotels for Government workers shall be conducted as hotels for Government workers for the period of one year from and after the passage of this act and so long thereafter as, in the judgment of the Public Building Commission, they are actually needed and are conducted without cost to the Government, and in estimating the cost to the Government nothing shall be included on account of interest on the amount invested in said buildings."

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, we do not want to turn these young ladies out of the comfortable apartments they now occupy if these hotels can be operated without cost to the Government, whether that period of operation extends over one year or not. It would be wasteful, indeed, to destroy those buildings and sell their furnishings and other equipment if they are being operated economically and efficiently and are not a burden to the Treasury of the United States, and they will, I think, become self-sustaining in a year. They may become self-sustaining in a month; they may be self-sustaining to-day; at any rate, we know from what has been said on the floor, and some of us as a result of our observation, that they are almost, if not quite, self-sustaining now. The expense of maintaining them, even if they are conducted at a slight loss for a year, will not be great, and during that period of time the present efficient management will be able, if they are conducted at a loss, to so adjust the overhead expenses or to so slightly increase the cost to the young ladies who now occupy those rooms and take their meals in those dining rooms that, without burdening them, they will not be an expense to the Treasury thereafter. Of course, nobody expects these hotels to pay interest on the investment. We do not want some executive officer of this Government hereafter to construe as part of the cost of maintenance the interest on the amount the Government may have invested in this proposition. Therefore if this amendment is voted down I shall offer this as a substitute to the pending amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, just a moment, please. I want to state that the committee earnestly hopes that neither the Black nor the Rainey amendments will be adopted. We think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida is liberal enough and gives abundant time, as much as Congress ought to extend.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for five minutes, which would be out of order because debate is exhausted.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Debate is not exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I desire to be heard on this.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I understand debate has not been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimouse consent that debate close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman have in mind—I do not want any more time myself, but if all is to be used in opposition to the substitute I would ask that some time on the question be granted——

Mr. LANGLEY. I have no information on that subject, but it is getting late and I thought we ought to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is the request of the gentleman from Ohio that he proceed out of order or proceed on this bill?

Mr. FESS. To proceed in order. I thought debate had been exhausted.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to delay the action of the committee, but I did want to say—it probably has been said frequently on both sides of the Chamber—that we are in a situation just now of vast expenditures on the part of the Government, in which we are spending money for new and various agencies created by the war, and that unless we take decisive action against making them permanent we will never get rid of them, and that is why I would hate to see the amendment of my good friend from Texas, with whom I frequently vote, pass, because it makes this temporary policy permanent. The housing proposition was an emergency, an agency of many others to meet the necessities of war, to be disbanded when war ended, and the trouble will be to prevent it becoming permanent and perpetual.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BLACK. I will ask if the gentleman does not favor my proposition? Does he favor the proposition of the committee to leave it entirely within the discretion of this commission as to how long they shall operate these dormitories? They might close them up in two weeks.

Mr. FESS. I would much prefer leaving it to the commission than make it permanent by law, as proposed in the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FESS. My time will all be exhausted. A recent report states that in England to-day there are still over 400,000 people who entered Government employment during the war and are still carried on the pay rolls. They refuse to return to a productive capacity because they prefer to be with the Government in its employ. This persistence to remain on the pay roll, whether the need is present or not, is not confined to England. It is a by-product of war. Wages are better, work is less arduous, conditions socially are more pleasing, and, generally speaking, greater honor attaches to such employment. Hence the great hordes of officeholders clinging to temporary employment and their efforts to make it permanent, such as the citation of the situation in England.

That is a remarkable statement as applied to England, and is official. I would like to know, and it is a pertinent inquiry for Congress to make, how many people are in the employment of the Government to-day, more than a year after the armistice, that came in under legitimate agencies and who are insisting on becoming permanently employed. Every effort to drop an employee or eliminate a war agency is resisted. If we do not take a decisive stand here and now to cut off these agencies that were created under the stress of war and which are now clamoring for perpetual life, and which are demanded by a great many people on the basis that it is an uplift movement in the interest of the country, a progressive movement, we shall never lessen the expense of the Government. This clamor is largely centered here in the Capital, and we are facing it right now in the housing proposition. I want to vote, not to embarrass matters here, but to take the earliest possible step to reduce all unnecessary expenditures. Many of them, we know, must cease in the near future, and yet we know they will not cease unless we take direct action. That is why I will vote to abolish this new agency, which, if you permit it to exist, will continue to accumulate in its demands and in its outlay on the part of the Government, as is always true. We must take this step just as soon as it is possible to do it, with the least embarrassment to the Government in so doing.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I wanted to call attention to the fact that $128,101,000, due now for 83 years, awaiting direction otherwise by Congress for the collection of the money, is a similar proposition.

Mr. FESS. This is but a comment upon the necessity for action. Mr. Chairman, just this further word: I have found it to be the experience in institutional life, like universities, for example, that the greater the endowment the greater the outlay always to the student. The more numerous the institutions we create under the Government the more expense to the unit it will be; and if we keep on creating agencies we will find every agency will cost vastly more when run by the Government than it would if it were run outside of the Government. That inevitably is the result. And it is our business, without embarrassing the Government, to cut off everywhere it can be done, and I think this is a good step.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, we have three propositions, two pending and one proposed. The first proposition is that these dormitories be closed within a year after peace is declared. The second proposition is to have them maintained until Congress shall repeal the authority. That is the substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. And the only difference otherwise is that he directs the Superintendent of the Capitol to operate the dormitories. I think if it is left to the Public Building Commission that would be the effect anyway, and it is not necessary to say that. I think it is better to hold both the Public Building Commission and the superintendent responsible than to simply hold the superintendent responsible.

Now, my colleague has offered what seems to me the proper solution. I think we ought not to provide that the dormitories shall continue until Congress shall repeal the authority. Legislation is not so easily put through, and the moment you put it in that shape everybody connected with the dormitories who wants to retain his position will use all of his influence—and frequently the smallest have a good deal of influence in that way—to prevent action by Congress, either in this House or in another body. I do not believe that Congress wants to say that these dormitories shall be absolutely closed up in a year or in a year and two or three months from the time peace is declared, if peace is declared soon, when the exigency may still exist at that time that should keep the dormitories in operation.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very briefly. I want to discuss something, and I have not much time.

Mr. BLACK. Very well.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If we say they have got to be closed in that time they will be closed, unless there be legislation extending them. We had an example of hasty legislation yesterday about closing up something enacted months ago and repealed yesterday. My colleague offered a substitute providing that the Public Building Commission shall continue to operate these dormitories for a year, or as much longer as the exigency requires, and they pay their own expense, not including interest as a part of the expense. What possible objection can the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] have to that proposition? That leaves to the the Public Building Commission the right to say at the end of a year whether there is room enough in Washington without these dormitories. If there is not enough in which to house these clerks at the end of a year, we ought to maintain the dormitories after that at their expense. And there is nobody here or elsewhere that is more anxious to see the Plaza turned into a plaza than this gentleman now addressing the House. I think we ought not to close the thing up so that it will require future legislation. Leave it to the Public Building Commission so that it will operate the dormitories as long as it is necessary, and then stop them. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I believe there are five minutes remaining, all of which I shall not use. The gentleman from Illinois always very plausibly argues his point, but notwithstanding his apparent logic and plausibility I am not convinced that the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted. What is the situation? We have down there now on the Plaza a number of buildings that are admirably equipped for Government hotels. They are furnished. They are filled to capacity with Government workers. Now, it is not a question as to whether we have more Government workers in the city of Washington than we ought to have. I do not controvert the point that in all probability a reduction of force could be made. But even with that, I think any man who has taken note of the situation is bound to admit that we will still need these dormitories.

Now, it looks to me like going at the thing backward, to anticipate the future and repeal the law. If it develops that there is still need for them, Congress will have to come in and, by another affirmative act, extend the period of their operation. It looks to me as though the most sensible thing would be to say that we will continue to operate these essential Government activities until Congress in its wisdom—and Congress meets every year—decides otherwise. Therefore I believe that my substitute ought to be adopted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that all that the committee desires is to get this bill in good shape. We have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY], but we do hope the committee will vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MOONEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the substitute be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The substitute offered by Mr. BLACK was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLACK. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 69.

So the Black substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] offers a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 3, line 6, after the word "decide," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following:

"Provided, That dormitories now used as hotels for Government workers shall be conducted as hotels for Government workers for a period of one year from and after the passage of this act and so long thereafter as in the judgment of the Public Building Commission they are actually needed and conducted without cost to the Government, and in estimating the cost to the Government nothing shall be included on account of interest on the amount invested in said buildings."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the committee has no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by substituting a colon instead of a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY: After the word "decide," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following, etc.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of the substitute the language leaving it to the Public Building Commission to continue beyond a year in their judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to amend the substitute in the manner in which the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania to the substitute offered by Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY: After the word "act" strike out the following language: "and so long thereafter as in the judgment of the Public Building Commission they are actually needed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the substitute was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the substitute to strike out the requirement that they be operated for one year and also "so long thereafter," leaving it entirely to the commission to operate them as long as it may deem necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON to the substitute offered by Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY: After the word "workers" strike out the following language: "for a period of one year from and after the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY].

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all land within the District of Columbia, acquired under the said acts and which is still vacant and unimproved, and all personal property in said District of Columbia acquired under said acts, shall, by the Secretary of Labor, be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury at once, to be disposed of in the same manner as provided in section 2 for the sale of property outside the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the committee amendment.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the committee amendment been reported?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 7, strike out the word "Columbia" and insert the word "Columbia" and a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to line 9, page 3, of the bill, to add, after the words "personal property," the words "except that provided for in section 3 hereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAKER: Page 3, line 9, after the word "property," insert "except that provided for in section 3."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is unnecessary. It is already covered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 4, noes 60.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 3, line 14, after the word "Columbia," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following language: "Provided, Such personal property as may be needed in the operation of the Government dormitories on Union Station Plaza shall not be sold until authorized by Congress."

Mr. BLACK. The committee may argue that the adoption of the language of the Rainey amendment would obviate the necessity of the amendment I have offered to section 4, but I do not believe it will.

Section 4 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of all personal property acquired under these Housing Corporation acts. Now, I do not think we ought to leave anything to ambiguity or construction, and I think we ought to say specifically in section 4 that none of the property needed in the operation of these Government dormitories shall be sold.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. TILSON. Having in the previous section passed an amendment turning over to the Building Commission, and leaving within the discretion of that commission the conduct of this property as a hotel after one year, should we not put it in the discretion of that commission to sell this personal property at any time they see fit after one year? Otherwise the commission might discontinue the use of the buildings as dormitories and yet have no power to dispose of the furniture until specifically empowered by Congress.

Mr. BLACK. That would be a matter that probably ought to have been offered to the other section. Of course, Congress can take that up at any time, but I do not think we ought to give a broad blanket power in section 4 to the Secretary of the Treasury to sell all of the property purchased under these various acts, and yet contend that by construction he would be precluded from doing so under the language adopted in section 4. I think we ought to make it clear, and I believe my amendment will do that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no necessity on earth for that amendment. Under section 3, in addition to the Rainey amendment, we have inserted, after the word "act," in line 4, the words "and all the furnishings therein." We have already required the dormitories and all the furnishings therein to be turned over to the commission. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury can not sell anything he has not got. He can not sell anything that is not turned over to him, and it is absolutely unnecessary to put it in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That if title to any real estate, either within or without the District of Columbia, acquired under any of the acts which are to be repealed by this act has been taken in the name of the United States Housing Corporation, or any other agency created or acting under said acts or any of them, the said United States Housing Corporation or other agency shall, immediately upon the passage of this act, convey to the United States of America, by good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance, all of such real estate wherever situate.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 15, after the word "that," strike out the word "if" and insert "where."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 17, strike out the word "act" and insert "act" and a comma.

The amendment was agreed to:

Also the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 19, strike out the word "agency" and insert "agency" and a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 20, strike out the word "acts" and insert "acts" and a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 3, line 24, after the word "situate," strike out the period and insert the following: "and shall fully and completely close up its business and transfer all of its credits and moneys to the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I understand this amendment is agreeable to the committee, and it will provide for the final closing up of this corporation.

Mr. LANGLEY. That amendment is satisfactory to the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Labor, the United States Bureau of Housing and Transportation, the United States Housing Corporation, and each and every other person or agency now or heretofore operating or acting under and by virtue of the said act of May 16, 1918, or any act or acts amendatory thereof, in possession of any notes, mortgages, contracts, or other evidences of indebtedness to the United States, or to any such officials or agencies for the benefit of the United States, by reason of any advances or loans of money to any transportation company, municipality, person, firm, or corporation, made by any of such officers or agencies for the United States, shall, immediately upon the passage of this act, take such action as may be necessary to vest absolute title to such evidences of indebtedness in the United States of America and deliver the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall adjust and collect the same according to their tenor and effect, paying the proceeds thereof into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 4, line 6, strike out the word "in" and insert the word "having."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 6, after the word "of" insert the words "or title to."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The first section repeals the act except as designated in the amendment adopted which was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. There is no provision in the bill now, and I call the attention of the committee to the fact, which will provide for the transfer of the extensive and valuable records in the possession of this department. These records should be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury in addition to the transfer of the property, and I trust that the gentleman will not overlook offering an amendment to that effect.

Mr. LANGLEY. That necessarily follows.

Mr. RAKER. Where will the records go? The Secretary of Labor is now an officer of the Cabinet, appointed by the President. These records are up in the air. They are not a part of the Department of Labor records. You are turning over the property of certain officers, but you have valuable records, and I call the attention of the committee so that they can make it complete that the records be transferred.

Mr. LANGLEY. I never heard of a bureau being transferred to another department without the records going with it.

Mr. RAKER. You have not transferred them by any language and you have not transferred the bureau.

Mr. LANGLEY. I mean the corporation.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That upon the passage of this act, if there be any uncompleted contracts, or any pending claims growing out of contracts completed or uncompleted, all such contracts and documents relating thereto shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury and the same adjusted and settled by the proper officers in the Treasury Department.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 4, line 19, after the word "that," strike out the words "upon the passage of this act if there be" and insert the words "where there are."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 20, after the word "uncompleted," strike out the word "contracts" and insert the word "contracts" with a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 23, after the word "the," insert the word "immediately."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. In line with the suggestion of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 22, after the word "thereto," insert "and all official records in the United States Bureau of Housing and Transportation, or the United States Housing Corporation."

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not think it is necessary, Mr. Chairman, but the committee has no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same, had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER) there were—ayes 103, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LANGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I call up the bill H. R. 484.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 484) to provide for the erection of a Federal office building on the site acquired for the Subtreasury in St. Louis, Mo.

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out that provision in the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 886), which authorized the construction of a building for the United States Subtreasury and other governmental offices in St. Louis, Mo., upon the site theretofore acquired for that purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury may have said building so constructed as to omit accommodations for the Subtreasury.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 484, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, just a word of explanation in regard to the bill.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, is this the bill that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] tried to get up last evening?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes. Some Members seem to have the impression that this is a new enterprise. It is not. It was fully provided for in the act of March 3, 1913. The limit of cost for the building is $1,000,000. The site has been secured. Nothing has been done toward the construction of the building. This bill provides for the elimination from the law of March 3, 1913, of the provision relating to the Subtreasury. To carry out the provisions of the law as it stands, we would need to construct vaults and to purchase bank fixtures, all of which would be quite expensive, requiring the use of considerable space that could otherwise be used by clerks. This bill proposes to eliminate that provision, and gentlemen may ask why. It appears that the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in St. Louis has reduced the work of the Subtreasury to such an extent that the quarters that it then occupied and that it still occupies are fully adequate to its needs. It is proposed, therefore, to amend this law so that the expense of construction will be reduced by avoiding the use of the vaults and the bank fixtures, and utilizing that space for clerks. That will enable us, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, to provide space for all of the Government activities in the city of St. Louis. We are now paying out a little over $28,000 a year for rent for quarters for clerks in other departments of the service. This provision will bring the whole range of Government activities into the new building when constructed. The bill will not advance appropriations a single dollar. The economy thus provided, in the judgment of the committee, urges the passage of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I just want to state that this bill was prepared at the Treasury Department and is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I assume that gentlemen who are opposed to this measure are entitled to one hour under the rule? I am not opposed to it, but I want any gentlemen who are to have that opportunity.

Mr. LANGLEY. No one is opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out that provision in the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 886), which authorized the construction of a building for the United States Subtreasury and other governmental offices in St. Louis, Mo., upon the site theretofore acquired for that purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury may have said building so constructed as to omit accommodations for the Subtreasury.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 484) to provide for the erection of a Federal office building on the site acquired for the Subtreasury in St. Louis, Mo., and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 213. A joint resolution continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 3418. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the lading or unlading of vessels at night, the preliminary entry of vessels, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1911; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

S. 3371. An act authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the White River; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. ASHBROOK, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. OLIVER, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WALSH, for two days, on account of official business.

To Mr. FIELDS, for to-day, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 18, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation for the relief of contractors, Treasury Department, for inclusion in urgent deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 526); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the Bureau of Crop Estimates for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 527); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of appropriation to reimburse A. Besalu & Co., of Santiago de Cuba, for damage done by collision with Marine Corps truck (H. Doc. No. 528); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Colorado River, Tex., from its mouth as far up as is practicable, with a view to removing the raft, including consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local or other interests (H. Doc. No. 529); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with accompanying paper and without illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LEHLBACH, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 263) extending the time for filing final report of the Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries, created by section 9, Public, No. 314, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved March 1, 1919, to a date not later than March 12, 1920, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 507), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CURRY of California, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10873) to provide for the acquisition by the United States of private rights of fishery in and about Pearl Harbor, Territory of Hawaii, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 508), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9658) granting an increase of pension to Clara J. Sitton; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 10900) granting a pension to Emma Bouse; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 11006) granting a pension to Augustus O. Hartel; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 11095) granting an increase of pension to Theresa Brisbois; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 11271) granting a pension to Adam Perry Kaufman; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HOCH: A bill (H. R. 11273) to prescribe certain conditions upon which newspapers and periodicals shall be entitled to the privileges of the second-class postage rate; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 18, 1919.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, Dec. 16, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Elkins	La Follette	Ransdell
Brandegee	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Sheppard
Calder	Gay	McLean	Sherman
Capper	Hale	McNary	Simmons
Chamberlain	Harrison	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Watson
Dial	Kellogg	Norris	Wolcott

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. LODGE, Mr. NEW, Mr. NEWBERRY, Mr. NUGENT, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. STERLING, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. EDGE, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. COLT, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. TOWNSEND entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. McLEAN. The conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the House to Senate bill 2472, to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, which was originally presented to the House and afterwards to the Senate and adopted early in the week, contains three or four clerical errors. I ask that the pending measure be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may consider a concurrent resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to make the necessary corrections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLEAN. I submit the following concurrent resolution and ask for its adoption.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 22) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enroll the bill (S. 2472) "to amend an act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act," as follows:

Insert the matter proposed by House amendment No. 15, and after "herein," on page 5, line 8, of the engrossed bill, insert "Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prohibit the Federal Reserve Board, under its power to prescribe rules and regulations, from limiting the aggregate amount of liabilities of any or all classes incurred by the corporation and outstanding at any one time."

On page 5, line 24, of the engrossed bill, strike out the word "not."

On page 5, line 25, of the engrossed bill, after "transacting," insert the word "any."

On page 5, line 25, of the engrossed bill, after "United States," strike out the comma.

On page 6, line 5, of the engrossed bill, restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 21 and insert the matter proposed by said amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut if this is new matter or is it merely to correct clerical errors?

Mr. McLEAN. Merely clerical errors.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask whether the matter was left out of the enrolled bill and is matter that has been passed on by both Houses of Congress heretofore?

Mr. McLEAN. It was passed on by both Houses, and if the conference report was strictly followed it would break the sense of the bill. The resolution merely carries out the intent of the report of the conference committee. There is a comma inserted that should be erased, and if the report of the committee was strictly followed there would be a duplication of the word "not" and one proviso would be in the wrong place.

Mr. KIRBY. Would it not be better to have the bill reenrolled than to attempt to correct it in this way?

Mr. McLEAN. What is the suggestion of the Senator?

Mr. KIRBY. My idea is that it is not contemplated that legislation shall be enacted in this manner. The bill has been passed and agreed on by both Houses; and if it has been enrolled that ought to be the final determination, and it becomes a law upon the approval of the President. If it has been incorrectly enrolled, it ought to be reenrolled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been yet enrolled and the resolution is to correct certain errors. There is no doubt about the report of the conference committee being incorrect in the particulars named.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no objection to the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. FERNALD. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it is not on the calendar, and so the Chair is not to blame for it, but there was a unanimous-consent agreement to take up the sugar question at 11 o'clock, and nothing will interfere with that now.

Mr. HARRISON. Is Senate bill 3284 before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes, is before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to have something to say before the Senate votes on that measure.

Mr. President and Members of the Senate, I hope that the Senate will very carefully consider this matter before it follows the unusual proceeding of accepting the House bill on a very important measure like this. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] yesterday in debating this question stated that the House had passed the bill in 48 hours. I believe they did pass it in 48 hours. Far be it from me to criticize anything done by the House——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Louisiana suspend until the private business of individual Senators is transacted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is that a motion?

Mr. THOMAS. I will make it as a motion if necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Colorado. I should like to have Senators listen to me, as this matter is quite an important one. It will violate all the precedents of our country if we pass this House bill, and I should at least like to have Senators understand what they are doing should they vote to adopt the amendment of the House. I can not believe the Senate will ever do such a thing.

I was proceeding to say that the House had acted upon this very important measure in two days' time—in 48 hours. The bill was before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for quite a while. We had rather extended hearings, which embrace two big pamphlets which I hold in my hand [exhibiting], one containing 164 pages and the other containing 81 pages. The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry debated the question very thoroughly for a number of days. It then reported a bill to the Senate authorizing the Sugar Equalization Board to be extended for one year and to purchase whatever sugar may be necessary to give to the American people all of that commodity they need.

The bill came up before the Senate several days ago; it was slightly modified on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], so as to abolish the zone system now in vogue under the administration of the Sugar Equalization Board, and was passed. The bill was sent to the House, which struck out all after the enacting clause and included in the terms of the bill which they present to us an extension for one year of the license provision of the Lever Food Control Act.

Before entering into a general discussion of the bill I want to read to the Senate exactly what the provision of the Lever bill is. I wish also to compare the Senate provision in regard to the license clause of the Lever bill with the House provision. This is the provision in the Senate bill, which we passed:

Provided, That after the passage of this act neither the President nor the corporation shall have or exercise, either directly or indirectly, with respect to raw or refined sugar, sirups, or molasses, any of the powers conferred upon the President by section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this clause specifically provides that none of the powers heretofore exercised under the food-control bill, to wit, the powers of regulation, of license and control, shall be exercised by the Sugar Equalization Board. We particularly placed our disapproval upon the further exercise of that war statute, a law which could only be justified by the needs of our country during the period of the world's greatest war, a war which ceased more than 13 months ago. Now, what does the House do in its bill? Let me read its provisions on that subject:

Sections 5 and 10 of the act entitled "An act to further provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, as far as the same relates to raw or refined sugar, sirups, or molasses, are hereby continued in full force and effect until December 31, 1920, notwithstanding the provisions of section 24 of said act.

Think of it, Senators! The provisions of this very drastic and unusual measure, absolutely unjustifiable except by the exigencies of war, are to be continued for a period of fully two years and two months after the close of the war.

Do we apply this drastic measure to all food products? Is it a general bill, fair and equal in terms to all? No. It is confined to sugar, sirups, and molasses. If there ever was attempted in this country a piece of indefensible class legislation, this bill in the form presented by the House is such an attempt.

The very principles on which our Government was founded are fair play and equal treatment to all men and to every kind and class of business. What right have we to single out the sugar industry, the sirup industry, the molasses industry, and inflict this unwarranted punishment on them by placing their business in peace times, long after the close of the war, under a war board which will have authority of espionage, the right to enter the private premises of anyone dealing in sugar, sirups, or molasses, and the power to license or to refuse a license to those engaged in any of these businesses? It is very easy for us to refuse to be disturbed when the other fellow's ox is being gored, but when it comes home to us and our ox is being gored it is not so simple.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that until very recently sugar has been certainly the cheapest food commodity on the market. It has been a great deal cheaper in proportion than butter, eggs, bacon, lard, beef, meal, and flour, or any of the other usual food commodities. It is not as high now as many other foodstuffs. Butter and eggs are more necessary to maintain human life than sugar, and they are very much higher at present than sugar.

If we are to single out sugar and place it under Government control, regulation, and license, why do we not single out butter and eggs, for instance? Why do we not continue for another season the regulation and control of wheat, which our friends from the wheat-growing section have considered—and I believe justly so—disastrous to their business?

Why do we not provide for Government regulation and control of the shoe industry? There is the greatest complaint that people are required to pay exorbitant prices for their shoes. I heard a young person no longer ago than this morning say, in speaking of Christmas, "Oh, this is going to be a sad Christmas for the poor, as everything is so high that a poor person can not even look at anything. They are not able to buy it, and they can not even look at it." Everything is abnormally high; so, if you are going to license sugar, if you are going to control the price of sugar because it seems to you to be a little high, why not control everything? Why not at one fell swoop put the Government into the business of buying, furnishing, and supplying food to the people of the country? Why not put it into the business of selling all the clothing the people need, of selling all the shoes that they need? Why not have a great, broad power, a "big father" here in Washington, doing all the business which the people generally have done heretofore for themselves?

Of course, such an idea as that is so ridiculous that it would be resented by any reasonable person; but, let me ask, Is there any reason why you should single out one commodity and not extend the principle to others? Is there any overweening necessity for such a thing?

I am perfectly willing to admit that in times of great public necessity nations are sometimes forced to let the law slumber in the face of the national needs, but no such situation exists now. There is plenty of sugar on the American Continent—I mean continental United States and our insular possessions and the island of Cuba. We could get along, if necessary, with a great deal less sugar than we are consuming to-day. Sugar is not generally considered to be a necessity of life but rather a luxury. I have always thought myself that it was a very healthful article of food, and certainly a very delicious article of food; but I believe that the human race could exist indefinitely if there were not a pound of sugar in the world. We could not exist indefinitely if there were not flour and meal and meat. They are necessities, but sugar is not.

However, if for the sake of argument we grant that sugar is a necessity to some extent, let us see why we should violate all rule and precedent, and pass this law in the form provided by the House, in order to secure that necessity.

There are in the United States a great many people engaged in the production of beet sugar. From the best information available the present Cuban crop is 4,500,000 tons. Cuba, of course, being so close to us, and in a way under our tutelage, we feel that we have a right to expect that if there be any favoritism it will be shown to us. It surely is an open market where all people can go and buy sugar, and there are 4,500,000 tons in the growing crop of Cuba, ready to be consumed by the world next year. It is estimated that the local consumption in Cuba amounts to 150,000 tons, so this will leave for export 4,350,000 tons.

Mr. Zabriskie, president of the United States Sugar Equalization Board, stated recently in one of the public hearings before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that about one-fourth of this Cuban crop had been sold, partly to European countries and in part to American refiners. Deducting this one-fourth—1,087,500 tons—we have in Cuba still remaining for export 3,262,500 tons. But do not overlook the fact that of the 1,087,500 tons already sold a portion thereof, according to Mr. Zabriskie, was bought by the American refiners, and is doubtless in this country ready to be sold to American consumers.

The Government estimates of the domestic sugar crop of the United States and its possessions are as follows, in short tons:

Beet crop of the United States, 953,000 tons.

Louisiana cane crop, 138,000 tons.

I wish to remind the Senate at this point that the Louisiana crop is usually upward of 300,000 tons; but, owing to the most unfavorable season in the history of the industry for a great many years, the crop is reduced more than one-half. It rained incessantly in the cane-sugar section of Louisiana and the people there have made a disastrously short crop. I understand that since this estimate was made the continued rain and the continued warm weather have caused the cane further to deteriorate, have kept it growing, have kept it so green that very little saccharine was formed in it, and the crop is really very much less than 138,000 tons. For the sake of the argument, however, I am treating it as being 138,000 tons.

The Hawaiian cane crop is 600,000 tons.

The Porto Rican cane crop is 300,000 tons.

This makes a total of 1,991,000 tons of domestic sugar, but takes no account of the Philippine crop, which is also domestic. I do not estimate the Philippine cane crop for the reason that the cost of transportation is so great that I am willing to assume that most, if not all, of the Philippine sugar will be sold abroad.

That gives us, then, available in Cuba 3,262,500 tons, and the domestic crop 1,991,000 tons. Reducing it to long tons of 2,240 pounds each, it leaves for distribution in this country a total of 5,040,200 tons.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I heard the statement from some authentic source the other day, as I thought—of course, it is only, I assume, an estimate—that the Louisiana crop this year would amount to 100,000 tons. The Senator has just made the statement that it was 138,000 tons. I assume that is the Senator's best judgment about it?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that I was giving the reports of the Government. I said that my best judgment was that it was less than that.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I did not understand that.

Mr. RANSDELL. These are the Government figures that I am quoting.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; that answers my question. Now, then, can the Senator tell us what portion of this crop has been marketed?

Mr. RANSDELL. I judge, from the best information I have been able to obtain, that something like two-thirds of the crop has been marketed; but I am going to ask my colleague, who is more familiar with that than I am, to say what percentage of the Louisiana cane crop he thinks has been marketed up to date. Will my colleague kindly answer that question?

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I think perhaps not that much sugar has been marketed, owing to the fact that it has been difficult to get cars to move the sugar. I think it would be fair to say that two-thirds has been manufactured, but I doubt if two-thirds has reached the market.

Mr. POMERENE. What would be the Senator's judgment, if I may ask, as to the amount which has in fact been either sold or marketed by the manufacturers?

Mr. GAY. I have no accurate figures here. I suppose about half.

Mr. POMERENE. Then may I ask another question? Can either of the Senators tell me at what figure this has been sold?

Mr. RANSDELL. I understood that the producers were selling that sugar in the raw state at 17 cents a pound wholesale and the refined sugar at 18 cents. I would like to say to the Senator in this connection that early in the season, I think as much as a couple of months ago, the two Senators from Louisiana and Congressman MARTIN, who represents the big sugar district of Louisiana, had several conferences with representatives of the Department of Justice. We had understood that the department was going to prosecute any persons who profiteered in food products of any kind. Sugar being a food product, it was naturally supposed that our people would be prosecuted if they engaged in profiteering. We pride ourselves on being a very law-abiding, patriotic people in that State, and we desired to avoid all trouble; we wanted to cooperate, as well as we could, with the administration of justice. So we called on the Attorney General and asked him if he would not have the Federal district attorney in New Orleans, Hon. Harry Mooney, ascertain, in any way that he could, by calling in witnesses, by conferring with sugar growers, by asking the advice of disinterested people who are familiar with the product, at what price the Louisiana sugar producer could sell his sugar and yet not subject himself to the charge of profiteering. That hearing was held by Federal District Attorney Mooney, and he came to the conclusion, after a thorough investigation, that if the people of Louisiana sold at an average of 17 cents for the raw sugar, or 18 cents for the refined sugar to the wholesalers, it would not be profiteering. So the people down there adopted that as their general price, and, so far as I am informed, have marketed the crop that has been marketed so far at those prices.

Mr. POMERENE. One broker in the city of Columbus some time ago issued a statement to the trade to the effect that he had at that time bought 15,000 barrels of Louisiana sugar at, I think, 17½ cents or 18 cents, but I am not clear about that. It was either the one figure or the other.

Mr. RANSDELL. He naturally bought the refined sugar, I will say to the Senator, and that would have been 18 cents.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may pursue my inquiry a little further, the Senator has indicated that in his judgment the figures 138,000 were in excess of the actual crop in Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think so.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the Senator's judgment as to the actual crop?

Mr. RANSDELL. That would be very much of a guess. I was influenced a good deal in arriving at that opinion by a statement made by Congressman MARTIN, who is a conservative man and very well posted. He told me that for a while they thought they were going to make upward of 40 per cent, but owing to the continued rains and the untoward season, many of them would not make more than 25 per cent of their crop, and it would be very much less than 138,000 tons. But he did not say how much it would be, and I could not even guess, but considerably less than 138,000 tons.

Mr. POMERENE. That is the Senator's judgment?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. I can understand that neither Representative MARTIN nor the Senator could get at the exact figures.

Mr. RANSDELL. No, sir; we could not get the exact figures.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MCNARY. I simply want to supplement the statement of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] by remarking that all those who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate agreed that the crop this year, the 1919–20 crop, I will call it, in Louisiana, will be about 100,000 tons.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, for the year 1919?

Mr. MCNARY. For 1919.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GAY. The statement of the Senator from Oregon is absolutely correct; but I want to say that since the harvesting season has commenced I think they have found that they overestimated the crop.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator please state what were the reasons for the overestimate?

Mr. GAY. The tonnage was lighter per acre than was anticipated and, due to the prolonged wet season, the sucrose in the cane was much less than normal. I think that accounts for the overestimate.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator if normally we do not have a dry fall, with usually fairly early cool spells, which cause the cane to ripen and develop the sucrose, and if there was not an absence of both dryness and cool weather this fall.

Mr. GAY. It has rained in Louisiana since the beginning of October, 1918, almost constantly. There have been more than 100 inches of rainfall in some sections of the State, where the average rainfall should be between 50 and 60 inches. The fall of 1919 was very hot, as it was throughout the entire country, and the great amount of rain kept crops of all kinds in a growing condition, so that they did not have an opportunity to mature. The harvest season commenced toward the latter part of October, and the yield has been most disappointing, both in tonnage and in sucrose in the cane.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for that statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the propriety of a presiding officer keeping silent, but now and then the presiding officer has to vote on a bill. I want to make an inquiry. Have we a Department of Justice that consults with people in the United States and determines the price at which they can sell goods, and promises immunity if they do not sell at higher prices?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know that we have, in answer to the question of the presiding officer; but I must say that I can not see that there was any impropriety whatever in the Department of Justice, when requested by representatives of this great Louisiana industry, having that informal inquiry conducted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator wait just a moment? The Department of Justice, I will add, did not voluntarily do that. It did not interfere, or attempt to interfere; but the Department of Justice is charged with the duty of prosecuting all profiteers.

Owing to the remarkable conditions in Louisiana, it was extremely difficult for our people to say what would constitute profiteering in that State. I do not think the Department of Justice wished to attempt to prosecute any people unless they had been acually guilty of profiteering.

The Vice President will readily understand that when a normal crop is made, you might sell that sugar at around 10 cents, as I understand the beet sugar people were very willing to do, and come out with a reasonable profit; you might sell the Porto Rican sugar around 10 cents and come out with a reasonable profit, because they have a normal crop; the Hawaiian sugar might be sold around 10 cents and come out with a fair profit, because the crop is normal. But with the vexatious conditions I have attempted to describe, and which my colleague has corroborated, of long-continued rains, it made a difference. I know in my part of Louisiana it rained for more than 12 months. It has been raining nearly all the time since the 1st of October, 1918, and it is raining yet; and with unusually warm weather, keeping the cane growing all the time. Such adverse conditions were present that we did not know what would be profiteering.

So in our distress and in our desire not to break the law, we called in this friendly manner upon the Department of Justice, and that action was taken. There was no price fixing, I may say, but it was simply a statement that if the people there did not sell their sugar at a price higher than 17 cents, it would not be considered profiteering. I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. In further answer to the question propounded by the Vice President, I wish to say that the Lever bill, as amended, and now in force, authorizes the Attorney General to bring suit against profiteers in food products and, of course, that includes sugar.

I wish to say that the Attorney General issued a statement to every beet sugar manufacturer in the United States, and called their attention to the fact that if they profiteered on sugar, the Department of Justice would proceed against them as profiteers in the selling of sugar. No beet sugar producer thought of profiteering; no beet sugar producer wants to profiteer; but the power is lodged with the Department of Justice to prosecute any profiteer selling food products in the United States. If I were a Senator from a State where the people were being compelled to pay 27 cents a pound for sugar, I would see that some action was taken against the profiteers, as there is no justification for selling sugar at that price, even though they paid 17 cents a pound for the Louisiana sugar.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely desire to say, in answer to the Senator from Utah, that if he were a Senator in a State where the people were being profiteered upon to the extent of 27 cents a pound for sugar, he would see that they were prosecuted. I know that the Senator would be very alert; he would probably serve his people better than any other Senator would. But I want to say that in my State I have taken up with the Department of Justice every instance that came to my notice. I wish I knew more to do to have this legislation passed. I have done my part in the matter, and I wish they could be prosecuted and will be prosecuted.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I had no idea of casting any reflection upon the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. That is about the third time the Senator from Utah has made that statement. The Senator from Mississippi has stated several times that he took it up with the Department of Justice. I could not do any more than that or I would have done it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what the Senator from Utah would have done, too, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Louisiana will yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Did the Senator from Mississippi obtain any explanation from the Department of Justice as to why they did not proceed against these profiteers?

Mr. HARRISON. I will say that the Department of Justice say that they are making an investigation of it and expect to proceed against these people, and to convict them if possible.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But they have taken no action?

Mr. HARRISON. The grand jury probably has not met since that time. I think the Department of Justice is really trying to do what it can. I have faith in the Department of Justice in the matter.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield further to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Mississippi, I infer from what he says, admits that he has been able so far to obtain no relief from the Department of Justice. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he has applied to the Sugar Equalization Board?

Mr. HARRISON. The Sugar Equalization Board has no authority to prosecute people. They are not extending the license system at this time. They are not functioning at this time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Sugar Equalization Board the same authority that is proposed to be conferred upon them under this act?

Mr. HARRISON. They could exercise the authority until the Lever Act expired, which would be at the termination of the war or the signing of the treaty of peace.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In other words, the Sugar Equalization Board, during all the time when these abuses existed, had the opportunity and the authority, if they chose to exercise it, to proceed to remedy the situation in the way that the Senator from Mississippi hopes will be followed under the act now pending; but yet they have not done it? I am asking for information.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is very much mistaken. The Sugar Equalization Board, as long as they functioned, maintained a price to the consumer of 9 cents a pound. Not only that, but they turned into the Federal Treasury $38,000,000. Congress did not act and pass legislation extending the food-control act through next year, which they all agreed would be necessary in order to purchase the Cuban crop of sugar, so that if they did purchase the Cuban crop of sugar they could regulate and control that crop. When they failed to get that legislation and the board apparently was about to cease to function, the prices began to soar and the people were compelled to pay the exorbitant prices that have been paid recently.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding is, and I will drop the matter with this remark, that whether they exercised the power or not they had the power, and the failure to exercise it was upon the responsibility of the Sugar Equalization Board.

Mr. HARRISON. The failure since the 3d day of October has not been with the Sugar Equalization Board or anybody else except the American Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted that the Department of Justice keeps informed as to the amount of sugar in the world and the trend of prices of sugar in the markets of the world. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I have just telephoned to New York to find out the prices on Cuban sugar to-day for December delivery, January delivery, and February to June of next year delivery. This is the response that I get:

Cuban sugar for December delivery is being purchased in New York to-day at 10½ cents with a few minor sales reaching as high as 12 cents. For January delivery—that is, next month—the sales are being made at 9 to 10 cents. For February to June delivery, purchases are being made at 8⅞ to 8¾ cents.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask the Senator, is that raw sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. That is Cuban raw sugar delivered at New York.

Mr. POMERENE. From whom do the quotations come?

Mr. SMOOT. I got them from the American Sugar Refining Co., and they are also confirmed within one-eighth of a cent by the Willett & Gray quotations given on December 11, as I remember.

Mr. POMERENE. Did the Senator have any communication on the subject, may I inquire, with the United States Sugar Equalization Board?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not had; but I am quite sure that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] has before him the issue of the Willett & Gray magazine for December 11 showing the prices, and they are almost identical with the prices that are being paid for sugar in New York to-day.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator if Willett & Gray are not considered about the highest authority on sugar in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. They are the highest authority on sugar in the world, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to know if the prices named by the Senator from Utah are for refined granulated sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. They are for Cuban sugar.

Mr. McNARY. That is not an answer to my question. Are they for refined granulated sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] to read the Willett & Gray announcement of December 11 and then the Senator will get just exactly what Willett & Gray say.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the junior Senator from Louisiana for that purpose.

Mr. GAY. The Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal, published by Willett & Gray, of December 11, 1919, contains an article headed "Raws," reading as follows:

[From Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal, December 11, 1919.]

Raws: Since our last report we have had quite an exciting market. Trade manufacturers who have recently been purchasing raw sugars for shipment during next year, and having them refined on toll, made urgent efforts during the week to obtain further supplies, particularly for December and early January shipment. Buyers appeared willing to pay as high as 15 cents for prompt-arrival sugars, but, as far as we can learn, there were none obtainable. Cubas for shipment during December at specified dates sold at 12 cents, and very early January shipment at 11 cents, and first-half January shipment at 10 cents, and all-January at 9¾ cents. All the above quotations f. o. b. Cuba. For the position of February–May the demand has not been so urgent, so that the advance established on these latter shipments has not been so large, as sales were made at 8⅞ cents f. o. b. Cuba, against quotations of 8¼ cents f. o. b. Cuba prevailing last week. As we go to press the market is easier, as the demand has materially slackened. The principal reason for the decreased demand has been the disposition on the part of our refiners to decline any further business on the toll basis. With the inability of manufacturers to have their raws made into refined, naturally their interest in the raw situation decreased.

Quotations at this writing: December, 10½ to 12 cents; January, 9¾ to 10 cents; February–June, 8¾ to 8⅞ cents; all f. o. b. Cuba.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. McNARY addressed the Chair.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Oregon, who has charge of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. It is fair to say in answer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that this does not refer to refined granulated sugar, which sold for 9 cents last year, but to the raw Cuban sugar which sold for 5½ cents per pound last year. The prices quoted are twice as high as those which the Government paid last year for raw sugar; and it is conformable to the statement I made a few days ago that I thought the whole crop could be had at 10½ cents a pound or less.

I desire to ask the Senator from Utah how extensive are these contracts and what part of the Cuban crop is involved?

Mr. SMOOT. The amount of the purchases is just what is being purchased in New York for the use of the refiners. I took for granted that everybody knew that Cuban sugar delivered at New York always came as raw sugar, and there is $1.54 per hundred pounds allowed between raw Cuban sugar and granulated sugar.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I interpose the remark that that was the refining price last year? I do not know what it is now. It may be higher.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, speaking of sugar produced for the year 1918, that beet-sugar manufacturers paid only $7.50 a ton for beets. For this present crop they paid $10 a ton, and they paid just what Mr. Hoover told them to pay, and they sold their sugar last year at exactly what Mr. Hoover told them to sell for. The beet-sugar manufacturers this year have been willing to sell their sugar at whatever price the Sugar Equalization Board may fix. I told the committee having this matter in charge, speaking for the beet-sugar people of the United States, that the producers were only too glad to sell the sugar at whatever price might be fixed by the Sugar Equalization Board; and they taking that position, we do not want Congress now to force them under a license system.

I will say also that I know they are perfectly willing now that sugar shall be sold to the consumer at a reasonable price. Mind you, the price that I speak of that they are paying now for beet sugar means the price of the sugar refined and delivered at the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to ask two or three questions of the Senator, if I may.

We have just been told that the price of raw sugar in December is 10½ cents, with a few sales at 12 cents. In January the price is 9 to 10 cents, and in February and subsequent months it is still lower.

Of course, as time goes on, from month to month a large part of the sugar will be consumed, and necessarily there will be less sugar available in January or February than there is at the present time. I wish to ask whether the high prices for December sugar do not indicate to the Senator that there is some speculation now which is affecting the price of the sugar?

Mr. RANSDELL. There possibly is. I could not say about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that it indicates that the refiners of sugar and also those who are interested in sugar see a crop sufficient to meet the demands and more than the demands if the present high prices prevail. Therefore the price of sugar for future delivery is declining; and if the estimates are right as given from several sources, there is ample sugar to supply the world.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask another question?

Mr. GAY. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield later to the Senator from Louisiana, if he will pardon me.

Mr. GAY. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GAY. The price at this time shows plainly that the Cubans, in view of the proposed legislation, which I feel confident they are watching very carefully, have offered sugar at the advanced price at which they expect the United States to purchase the entire Cuban crop through the Sugar Equalization Board. If this bill should be enacted into law and become effective at this time we would purchase at advanced prices instead of letting the whole trade go through the ordinary channels. Why project this month's famine price over the entire year?

It is indicated plainly that when the agitation in favor of this bill had ceased the Cubans were very fearful that the Sugar Equalization Board would go out of existence and that they could not sell their crop at the highest price; they were afraid they were going to have to return to the system of buying and selling according to the system of supply and demand.

The refiners have never been talking about 25 or 30 cent sugar. They have not lost their heads in this excitement. They are a canny lot. This is nothing but playing into the hands of the Cuban producers, who would be glad to see the United States buy a year's supply of sugar at the very highest price. When the 1st of February comes it is estimated there will be a great deal more sugar in this country than we can consume in nine months' time. That is the situation at present.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to get at the exact truth, if I can; and I want to give to the Senator some figures, if he will be kind enough to follow me.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. POMERENE. In Ohio we have, in round numbers, a population of 5,000,000. The annual per capita consumption of sugar being 92 pounds, the total consumption in Ohio is 460,000,000 pounds. A variation in price of 1 cent a pound for the entire consumption in Ohio would mean to the people of Ohio an expenditure of $4,600,000; a variation of 5 cents would mean $23,000,000. The total cost of the entire consumption for one year at 10½ cents, being the price which was fixed for beet sugar, would be $48,300,000. These figures will indicate to the Senator that this is a very serious problem, so far as the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent are concerned.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to ask the Senator at that point if he is figuring the total price for beet sugar at 10½ cents or the advance on what the price ought to be?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I am figuring it merely at 10½ cents. I want to get some figures which we can use as a basis of calculation.

I have said that an advance of 1 cent a pound to the people of my State will mean $4,600,000.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator what he means by "an advance"—an advance of 1 cent a pound on what?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not mean it that way. I mean if we could get it at an increase of 1 cent a pound it would mean $4,600,000, while if it is advanced 2 cents a pound it would mean another $4,600,000.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thought the Senator was establishing a unit. I did not understand him.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I am not. I want to call attention, now, to the situation so far as it affects Louisiana, if I may.

The Senators from Louisiana have given it as their best judgment—and I have put these figures down in pencil as the discussion has been going on—that the total crop of sugar in Louisiana is 100,000 tons, or thereabouts, for this year. Assume that those are the figures.

It is said that up to date 50,000 tons of the sugar have been sold. That would leave only 50,000 tons in prospect from the manufacturers for the general market. At 1 cent a pound that would mean just $1,000,000 on the 50,000 tons, and at 17½ cents a pound it would mean $17,500,000, assuming that it was all to be sold at that price. There would be a difference of $7,000,000 between the 17½-cent price and the 10½-cent price.

I want to apply this to Louisiana. According to the last census the great State of Louisiana had 1,656,388 people; and, with a per capita consumption of sugar of 92 pounds, the total Louisiana consumption would amount to 162,387,696 pounds, or 76,193 tons. If the sugar manufacturers of Louisiana have only 50,000 tons on hand, it indicates that they have on hand only two-thirds enough sugar for the consumption of their own people.

I recognize the fact that this means a good deal to the manufacturers; but does it not occur to the Senators from Louisiana, when the public authorities indicate that beet sugar can be manufactured at 10½ cents a pound, that, if we are to make a price of 17½ cents a pound—and I regret exceedingly that the people of Louisiana have not had a good crop—every time the price is advanced 1 cent above 10½ cents to the people of my State it means $4,600,000; that 1 cent a pound advance means to the people of the entire country $101,200,000, and a 5-cent increase a pound means an advance of $506,000,000? Does it not occur to the Senator from Louisiana that under those circumstances there either ought to be some concession made or something done so that we can relieve the good people of Louisiana, the producers of sugar there, and all the remainder of the people in Louisiana from paying this high price in order to compensate somebody who happens to have a loss? Ought the entire people of 48 States pay tribute in this vast amount because of such loss?

Those are questions which address themselves to my mind as I think about the subject; and their gravity, it seems to me, is momentous. I want to help; but, while there is a duty which we owe to the good sugar planters down in Louisiana, is there not also a duty that they and the sugar producers generally owe to the public at large?

I am obliged to the Senator from Louisiana for permitting me thus to interrupt him. I should be very glad to have the Senator suggest what the United States Congress ought to do under these circumstances that will be fair and equitable and just to all of the people of the United States; for we are interested in all the people of the United States, no matter whether they are in Louisiana or Oregon or Ohio; and I am sure the Senator from Louisiana looks at it in just that light.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RANSDELL. No; I can not yield now. I desire to answer the question of the Senator from Ohio first.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wish to submit a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. RANSDELL. I would rather answer the Senator from Ohio briefly, and then I will give the Senator from Mississippi an opportunity.

Mr. HARRISON. There are only seven minutes remaining to consider this bill under the agreement, and I had hoped that we might agree to vote at a certain time. Would the Senator object to that?

Mr. RANSDELL. I would certainly object to voting at any time. I have not nearly finished my discussion of the question. I have yielded to many Senators, and I should like to go on with the discussion and finish it.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will have to decline to yield until I answer the question of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not wish to ask the Senator a question, but I should like to make a request of the Senate for unanimous consent.

Mr. RANSDELL. I would yield for that purpose.

Mr. KIRBY. It is evident the Senator from Louisiana expects to talk out the time which has been granted for the consideration of the sugar bill and that no action will be taken upon it. I regard this as a more important matter to the people of the United States than the railroad bill, because of the urgency of the situation, and I ask unanimous consent that the time shall be extended one hour further for the consideration of the bill now under discussion.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall have to object to that, Mr. President.

Now I wish to answer, as well as I can, the very fair, carefully worded question of the Senator from Ohio. He has evidently given great thought to the subject and has stated the question in plain, good language. I wish to say first that the people of Louisiana do not ask that any favor at all be shown to them. They simply ask that the ordinary laws of supply and demand be applied to them in the disposition of one of the great crops of their State.

I think a great deal of the trouble in this matter has grown out of the continuation of Government interference in private matters set up by us under the machinery known as the Sugar Equalization Board. That board has established zones in this country under which the people in the southern portion of the United States are in one zone, those in the North Atlantic section in another zone, and those of the West, in the beet-sugar region, in another. Three zones were established. The Louisiana people did not want the people of the Southern States, and especially of the State of Mississippi, placed in any zone with them, so that they would have to buy from us. We were entirely willing, and are willing now, that all zones be abolished, so that the remnant of the Cuban crop still remaining in the hands of the Sugar Equalization Board, and which has been sold to the wholesalers at 8.82 cents a pound—that was the price at which we sold the sugar of last year, the beet-sugar crop, the Louisiana crop, and the Cuban crop, 8.82 cents a pound—may be sold anywhere in the country.

Mr. POMERENE. That was done by the Sugar Equalization Board?

Mr. RANSDELL. The Sugar Equalization Board sold what they bought from Cuba at that price, and by agreement with the beet-sugar growers and the Louisiana sugar producers they sold their crops at the same price. The Sugar Equalization Board did not have power to enforce such a price, but we were all patriotic and we said, "We can live at that price for the crop of 1918 and we will sell at that price."

Of course, the Cuban crop has not yet been disposed of; they have some of that crop on hand, and they are continuing to sell it along the Atlantic seaboard, in that particular zone, at that price. The beet crop came in some weeks ago, but there was no arrangement as to the beet crop this year, so they began to sell at 10½ cents a pound. There was no arrangement as to the Louisiana crop of this year, and it was such a complete and thorough failure that we had to get 17 cents, and even then many of our people are losing money. We began to sell at 17 cents, but we did not ask anybody to pay that price unless he desired so to do, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I decline to yield for the moment. I must try to complete my answer, and then I will gladly yield to the Senator from Arkansas. The sugar producers of Louisiana could have sold the small crop they had to the candy manufacturers and to the soft-drink manufacturers at more than 17 cents, provided they had been allowed to go around the country and pick out such dealers wherever they were found; but most of our people—I do not say all of them, but most of them—tried to comply with the zone system established by the Sugar Equalization Board, and in that zone they sold their sugar at 17 cents.

I grant that it is pretty hard for the people of the United States to have to pay a big price for all their sugar in order to help out the Louisiana producers, but I deny that that is being done. I deny that one-fortieth of the whole can control the situation. I should like to say to the Senator from Ohio that, in round numbers, the United States uses 4,000,000 tons of sugar a year. That quantity will be available this year, for there is plenty of it in sight. Louisiana is making about 100,000 tons, or one-fortieth of the amount consumed. It is perfectly ridiculous to suppose that one-fortieth of the production can control the price. If we do away with the Sugar Equalization Board, do away with the zones, and let the people go freely throughout the country and buy sugar from the beet producers, from the Cubans, from the small amount that we have in Louisiana, there will not be any very great increase in the price—generally, I mean—at least, I do not think there should be. I think that public opinion against profiteering and the laws which I understand we have against profiteering would avail, and those who sold beet sugar or Hawaiian sugar or Cuban sugar at the exorbitant prices that have been mentioned here would be prosecuted.

I am going to ask the Senator this question, because he is a very fair man: Does he blame my constituents, who have suffered the awful losses caused by the God of Nature in almost complete failure of their crops, a loss which enables them only to make about one-third of a normal crop—does he blame them for wishing to sell their crop at a price which will at least enable them to come out whole, when, with that desire, they say to the balance of the country: "We ask no favors. We are perfectly willing to go on the open market with our little one-fortieth of the whole, and if we can not compete, then we will have to suffer the loss"?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 12.30 o'clock having arrived, and the prophecy of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] having been fulfilled, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether I will be interrupting any plan of his if I should present an amendment now? I do not know what order has been reached.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], to perfect the text.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, on yesterday I talked to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] and to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], both of whom have amendments here to perfect the text, while my amendment is to strike out; and, there being some question about the parliamentary status, the Chair ruled that the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois was in the nature of an amendment to perfect the text and took precedence over a motion to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is true.

Mr. STANLEY. I felt that outside of the parliamentary status this amendment of the Senator from Illinois would itself probably need perfecting, and is subject to amendment and to discussion, and that it would be much better to substitute something in lieu of the provisions of the bill after we had eliminated those provisions. As a matter of legislative procedure, it is unfortunate that the technique of parliamentary procedure prevents the carrying out of that program which I suggested to the Senator from Illinois at the time, before the amendment was offered. He stated yesterday that he was perfectly willing, if it met the approval of the Senator from New Mexico, who had a similar amendment, to withdraw his amendment temporarily and allow a vote on the amendment that I have offered to strike out certain provisions. I will ask unanimous consent that that procedure be followed, since it meets the approval of the proponents of both the other amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to the unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Kentucky, for I do not care how the Senate approaches this question. I understood from the Senator from Illinois last night that he had withdrawn the amendment as offered, but asked to have it printed, so that it would be before the Senate this morning.

Mr. STANLEY. That is the fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. However, it appears from the RECORD that I am mistaken with regard to that.

Mr. STANLEY. I will state to the chairman of the committee that his statement was based upon the statement made to me that he would withdraw it if it met with the approval of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], who we thought was here. I did not get to see the Senator from New Mexico until he was just preparing to leave, and by that time the Senator from Illinois was gone, and the agreement was not carried into effect because of other matters, roll calls and the like.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that the Senator from Kentucky now asks unanimous consent to present his amendment.

Mr. STANLEY. That is right, notwithstanding the ruling of Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. And have it voted upon first, notwithstanding the rules of the Senate.

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] is on his way over here from the Office Building. I wondered if this amendment could not, by unanimous consent, be temporarily laid aside, and let us dispose of the amendment which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] desires to offer.

Mr. STANLEY. I should prefer to let the amendment of the Senator from Illinois remain in abeyance and proceed with this amendment to strike out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say further that in a conversation I had with the Senator from Illinois this morning about the matter I understood him to indicate that he was willing that a vote should be had first upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. That is correct. The Senator from Illinois said that to me.

Mr. MCCORMICK entered the Chamber.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Illinois is here now, however, and he can speak for himself.

Mr. STANLEY. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I have just stated that if it meets with the approval of the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from New Mexico concurs, I should be glad to have a vote first on the motion to strike out, and then a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, in order that I may be clear as to the parliamentary status of the amendment which I have offered, let me inquire if I withdraw my amendment for the moment in order to permit a vote on that of the Senator from Kentucky would my amendment then be in order if that offered by the Senator from Kentucky should fail of adoption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois has moved to amend part of the text which the Senator from Kentucky has moved to strike out. If the motion of the Senator from Kentucky is first put and carried, the Senator from Illinois could accomplish his purpose by moving a new amendment embracing the part of the old text which he desires to remain, with the amendment which he desires to add to the old text. That is the only way in which it can be done.

Mr. McCORMICK. That I understand, Mr. President; but if the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky should fail of adoption, there is no doubt about my amendment being in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, there is no doubt at all.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then, Mr. President, since there are Senators who wish first to vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, and later, if it fails, to support an amendment like my own or that of the Senator from New Mexico, I will withdraw my amendment in order that that offered by the Senator from Kentucky may be voted upon directly.

Mr. STANLEY. I will say to the Senator from Illinois, in that connection, that if this amendment should prevail, it would not interfere at all with the offering of the subsequent provision and such amendments to it as might be necessary.

Mr. McCORMICK. I understand; but I feel that I owe this courtesy to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out sections 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31—that part of the bill relating to the settling of disputes and controversies between railways and their employees and creating a committee of wages and working conditions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, before a vote is taken upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], to strike out the provisions in this bill relating to labor adjustments, I desire to say a few words against the motion.

Since the dawn of civilization, no more difficult problem has faced humanity than the problems involved in labor and its employers. Naturally, there always has been a contention between the employer of labor and the employee. Up to the present time, at least in modern times, the contest between labor and capital, so called, has been settled by force. For many years, in the ages that have passed, labor was not strong enough to exercise its power effectively, and the force of capital dominated it, forced unreasonable and unjust terms on it, and it has only been through the gradual evolution of the rights of labor that it has come to a point where it can fight for itself.

Through the last half century labor has been fighting for itself, until to-day organized labor constitutes the effective force in human endeavor, the dominant force between labor and capital. It may be said that that is not an unjust position for it to occupy, because it has fought its way to that position. It would not be if the only matter in dispute were a fight between labor and capital. If that were all that were involved in the issue, I would not be in favor of the provisions of this part of the bill.

But the issue here goes far beyond the question of labor and capital. As a matter of fact, so far as railroad labor is concerned, it has no issue with invested capital. Theoretically it may have, but as a practical proposition the wages of labor engaged in railroad industry have long ceased to come out of invested capital. They come out of freight rates and passenger rates as prescribed by the Government, either through a director general or through the supervision of an Interstate Commerce Commission. The amount of labor involved and the value of labor's wage in this industry is so great that if it rested for one year upon invested capital it would destroy invested capital. Of necessity it must come out of the earnings of these roads, and the earnings of the roads must come out of the public.

If that is the case, is it fairly stating the proposition to say that labor must still carry its weapon of offense against capital, that the value of its wage must be determined on the battle ground between labor and capital, and then, after the battle is fought and won, the result of the victory must be assessed against the public, which has had no interest or no hand in the dispute?

But it does not even stop there. The public are not only required to pay the bill, but they must bear the burden of the fight. The reservation to labor of the right to strike is either an actual fact, a weapon that is poised on its way to the blow, or it is a mere theory and is of no value. If it is of no value, if it is not going to be used, if there is no danger of a strike, if it is not an effective weapon for labor, why should we hesitate to adopt clauses in this bill that provide that two or more men shall not conspire to interfere with interstate commerce? There is nothing to be obtained for labor if this is a mere theory, a weapon that will never be put into force.

On the other hand, if it is an actual weapon that some day may be used, who will pay the penalty? Of course there can be nothing else now but a universal railroad strike in this country. The day of a local strike is past. There may be a bubbling over here or there on the map. Labor leaders do not want local strikes. Railroad companies do not want them. It is only when the organization loses its control that a local strike takes place. The real effort is the effort to bring about a universal railroad strike in America.

That was threatened in 1916. We were told that it was imminent at that time unless remedial legislation was passed to avert it. Legislation was passed, and the strike was averted; and now we are told by some that there was no danger of that strike, that the men did not intend to strike, or that the representatives of the railroad companies would have surrendered. We are told by some that when labor came to Congress and asked that the Adamson bill be passed in order to avoid strike conditions the men who came here did not represent their organizations, and that they are in no way committed to the precedent set in that case. Nevertheless, a great strike was imminent, it was threatening the commercial life of the Nation, and was only avoided by legislative enactment.

Who would have paid the price if the railroads had stopped operating for 30 days by reason of a great strike? Capital would have been affected to some extent, because the earnings on capital might have been affected.

Labor would have suffered to a great extent, because labor's wages would have been wiped out for the period of the strike. But the sufferings neither of vested capital nor of labor would have been commensurate with the distress that would have come to every home of this land.

Stop the railroads from operating into the great cities for 30 days, and the population is starving. Stop the railroads from operating into an industrial center for 30 days, and commerce has ceased, and labor involved in commerce is out of employment. Stop the railroads from operating for 30 days, and the whole business life of the Nation has ceased to function. That is the price that the people of the United States must pay for the privilege given to organized labor to declare a universal strike for any cause and to make it effective.

I am not going to contend as to whether the cause of labor is just or not. Men are human, whether we class them in the aggregate or as individuals, and human nature is prone to err on either side of the equation. I think it is safe to say that sometimes a strike is most just, for a most just cause, and at other times a strike is without reason or justice behind it.

But that is not the question involved here. The public, the hundred millions of people in the United States, are not those who determine whether the strike is just or unjust. They merely stand to pay the penalty, and they will have to pay it some day, beyond peradventure of a doubt, if the Congress of the United States is unwilling to meet the situation and put remedial legislation on the statute books that will work justly to all men and avoid the dangers to the American public.

Some men speak of the so-called right to strike as if it were a human right, a right that belonged to men, like the right to live, the right to breathe, the right to work in an individual capacity. Organized labor itself repudiates the foremost right of man, the right to work, when it stands for a closed shop.

The by-laws of many of these organizations proclaim that no man can work in certain shops or at certain employment unless he belongs to a particular organization and works within the rules and according to the dictates of that organization.

If labor has the privilege and the right to deny to other labor the unrestricted right to toil and earn its daily wage, does it lie in their mouths to say that the Congress of the United States is taking away from them an inherent right that belongs to them when the Congress says, "You can work only under certain limitations," the Congress speaking for the whole people of the United States?

To strike! What does it mean? Men now talk of the right to strike as if it were the right to quit work. The right to strike and the right of the individual to quit his employment are two very different things.

One is the exercise of individual liberty, the other is the exercise of aggregate force to accomplish a purpose, to carry out the desire of the men engaged in the strike, or of the organization that has ordered the strike. One is a negative force, that hurts no man; the other is an active force, that injures many. This bill in its terms provides that nothing written in these pages shall be construed as preventing any man engaged in the railroad business from quitting his employment, and yet they speak of it as if this bill intended to coerce men to work when they did not desire to do so.

A strike is what it implies in its own terms. It is a blow, a blow directed with an object behind it, and it is the only way that it makes it effective. Is the Congress to stand here and allow any organization whatever to deliver a blow against the American public that may endanger the very life of the Nation, or is it our duty to see that substantial justice is done to all concerned without the delivery of the destructive blow?

When the bill and these provisions were before the Committee on Interstate Commerce Mr. Gompers appeared as a witness in opposition to the bill. I asked him some questions regarding the matter. I think his answers to the questions I asked thoroughly defined the position of labor in regard to the bill and where their position leads to. I am therefore going to take the time of the Senate to read three or four pages from the hearings, so that that provision may be made clear in the RECORD.

I said this to Mr. Gompers:

I think some of the gentlemen who have come before us have misunderstood the purpose or the reason for the initiation of this legislation; but I am sure you have not, because I think you recognize the fact that in recent years you and those you represent have been reasonably and fairly treated by Congress. Of course, this legislation comes with a sentiment behind it or it would not be here; but there is a sentiment among the people that is responsive to it, because Congress seldom acts without the sentiment of the people in framing legislation. Of course, you recognize that that sentiment comes from a fear that a general universal strike throughout this country would bring a debacle that would make the mass of the people who are not engaged in the strike suffer more than even the horrors of war. Now, that is the real thing that brings this legislation to the table. Now, I want to ask you if you oppose it or if you think it is ill advised to meet this situation by profit sharing or any other reward to labor except the just wage that is due it; how are we to avoid the danger to the public of an issue that comes, that may come at some time? Fortunately it has never come yet in that stressed form, the danger that may come to the public of a universal strike in this country that might last for months. Is there any other way to avoid it except by law?

Mr. Gompers answered the question as follows:

You can not avoid it by law. That is not the way to avoid it.

Then I asked:

What other way is there to avoid it? Of course, I do not so agree that it can not be avoided by law. You may be right; I may be wrong. I think the law goes a long ways sometimes——

Mr. GOMPERS. Sometimes.

Then I asked the question:

But I would like to have your view. I think it is a serious problem that confronts the country. I am sure that you realize the seriousness of the problem, and I would like to have your view on that subject.

Mr. GOMPERS. No one views that thought, much less that act, more seriously than I do; but I do know this: There has been no general strike of railroad men in the United States, and the attempt that was made in 1894 with the A. R. U. strike was, after a few days, practically abortive. The railroad brotherhoods stood as strongly against that general strike as any body of men could. They had more influence in determining that it should not pass those limits or reach those limits than anybody could have, the Congress included. The American Federation of Labor was a party to a conference in 1894 at Chicago where an urgent appeal was made to us to order or to declare for a general strike of all the workers of the country. The men of the American Federation of Labor were in conference with the chiefs of the railroad brotherhoods, and that was negatived. We were willing to do anything we could to bring about better conditions for the workers at Pullman, Ill., but we would not sanction, but gave our disapproval of, anything like a general railroad strike or a general strike among the workers.

Then I said:

Well, I am not talking about the past. I suppose the nearest we came to it was in 1916. But it does mean that that is what the public visualizes, and that is the sentiment that stands behind this bill.

Mr. GOMPERS. The question is whether such a strike could be prevented if this measure were enacted into the law. That is the question.

Then I asked the question:

Well, that question, of course, I recognize. I recognize, as a rule, if this became a law that it would prevent a universal strike; but I may be in error. You may be right; but the question I would be glad to have you answer to go into the record, not only for you and me but for the country to understand, is, Is there any other way that a universal railroad strike or the danger of it can be avoided if the Government itself does not act?

May I read that question again, because I want to impress it upon the record?

Is there any other way that a universal railroad strike or the danger of it can be avoided if the Government itself does not act?

Mr. Gompers answered:

I can not underwrite any measure or proposition that will absolutely prevent a general railroad strike. No one can. But this I do know: That fair treatment of the workers and with the workers' organizations is the best insurance against such a movement, such a strike. You will find the four railroad brotherhoods, with their executive officers, are men of experience, men of intelligence, and men with a fair sense of the responsibility that rests upon them. I do not mean only the chiefs of these brotherhoods; I have also in mind their associates on the executive boards and in the various divisions throughout the country.

There is no greater safeguard against such strikes than a reasonable course pursued by the companies and by the employers to treat with the workers and give these men a fair chance that they may have the opportunity of educating their fellows. If that chance is denied them, if every move they make is antagonized, their influence will be destroyed and the element that now would turn this country topsy-turvy would have the ear and the attention of the discontented in the organizations and the unorganized.

Then I said:

Well, I am interested in what you say, but that does not answer the question. I assume that you mean by your answer to the question that you do not think it is possible in any other way except by law, by this law, to eliminate the possibility, the future possibility, of a universal railroad strike.

Mr. GOMPERS. I say with the full understanding of the words I employ, that the surest way of creating dissension, greater unrest, possibly leading to such a strike, is the provision in that bill. No other agency could provoke it more than that bill.

Yesterday I took occasion in some little detail to discuss the experience of the countries in which compulsory arbitration has been tried. Although it is not called a compulsory arbitration law, it still is, in other words, a law to determine wages, hours, conditions of employment; and if there be no majority of the two parties or four, then there is an appeal to another board whose findings and award are final in matters on wages, hours, and conditions of employment. It is final. There is no appeal anywhere. The men must obey. They must work, whether they will it or not. They can not quit work, they can not strike, if you please. You will never take away from the working people by law or by any other process the right of the workers to quit their employment.

Then I said:

Well, I would not do that if I had the power.

Mr. GOMPERS. That is done in that bill.

I said:

I do not think it is in that bill.

Mr. Gompers said:

It is in the bill, section 29.

I then said:

But the difference is, or I think it is, under the bill, that there is no limitation on the power of the workers, in singles or in pairs, to quit the railroad employment unless they do it for the purpose of interfering with commerce, the movement of commerce. Of course that is a different question from the mere question of their right to work. In the interest of the public we pass many laws restricting the rights of the individual. Of course, to keep the flow of commerce that keeps the people of America going, I have no doubt, and I do not think you would disagree with me, that we have a right to pass reasonable laws and regulations in the protection of the public. That is the way I view this part of the section. The real question involved in this bill is the question of the Government fixing the wage instead of the corporation fixing the wage. Although this is called arbitration, I think you will agree with me that this is not compulsory arbitration, but, in the last analysis, it is the fixing of the wage by the Government. The Government board has the last say and it fixes the wage.

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes; and the men are compelled to work under that governmental award.

Then I said:

Well, just as clerks in a department in Washington, with their fixed wages, are obliged if they want to work at all.

Mr. GOMPERS. But they can not quit. They must work.

I said:

I do not understand it that way. I think you are wrong.

Omitting a few sentences there that are not pertinent to the issue, I said:

If it was intended to stop the movement of trains, yes; but not because a man was not satisfied with his job and wanted higher wages.

Mr. GOMPERS. The man who wants to quit his job can quit. It is not a question of a man quitting his job, but two men in concert quitting their jobs in order to persuade or influence the employer to grant better conditions; and the idea of simply quitting is not the only thing. No man can quit his job without inconveniencing the employer or others. The stenographers in the Senate, if they informed the clerk, or the man who has them in charge, who gives them employment, that they are no longer willing to work for the rate of compensation, and they quit work, it would inconvenience the Senate very materially; and that is the purpose, to inconvenience the Senate sufficiently that the Senate will yield a fair consideration to these men.

I will not take up the time of the Senate in reading further from this statement, but I have read from it for the purpose of bringing out two facts: One is that Mr. Gompers, the supreme head of organized labor in the United States, declares that there is no other way to avoid a universal strike except by this bill; and he denies that this bill will do it, but he says there is no other way. Then he says that a strike is an offensive weapon. In the last sentence that I read to you he admits the bill does not prevent the individual from exercising his personal liberty and quitting work when he desires to do so, but that it does prevent two or more from exercising the right to quit collectively so as to inconvenience their employer and by that course compel the employer to agree to their terms of employment.

That is the issue presented to the country. It is not disputed by the supreme head of organized labor. The question that confronts this body is whether or not, under those circumstances, the Senate of the United States intends to surrender the initiative—to recognize that there is no way to avoid the calamity of a universal strike except by law, and then refuse to pass the law.

About the terms of the law I am not so much concerned. Write in this bill a provision that the mass of the American people shall no longer be in danger of a universal strike and I am willing for you to write the terms under which labor shall surrender that so-called right.

I fully recognize the fact that the force of the blow under the right to strike is the weapon by which labor must battle upward, and under ordinary circumstances and conditions it is entitled to use that force in its own behalf, if it does not endanger the public. I also recognize the fact that if that right is taken away from organized labor or unorganized labor, in justice and right they must be given some remedy in its place. Labor should not be disarmed and capital left armed cap-a-pie to ride them down; there would be no justice in that, but in every other walk of life we have established the courts of the land to avoid the blow.

Back in the generations that have passed man held his property by force of arms; to-day he holds his property by force of law. So long as the strike did not threaten the body politic, the Government ignored the power of the strike, but now that the people, as a whole, are endangered, only the Government can protect them.

Is it injustice to any man to prepare a fair and just tribunal in which the great issue of wages and working conditions may be worked out and solved, first, in the interest of labor, and, second, in the interest of the American public?

Mr. Gompers, in his testimony—and I take his testimony because he is the leader; the testimony of the chiefs of the Brotherhoods who appeared before the committee was along similar lines—Mr. Gompers, in his testimony, says that the way to avoid strikes is through the moderation and conciliation of the railroad chiefs and their subordinates; the reaching of a common understanding on controverted matters; working out abstract justice through mediation. Have they any less opportunity to work out abstract justice through the mediation of a Government board such as is proposed by the bill than they have in a board of directors of a railroad company? I think not. I think the position of labor, if it is only battling for what is justly its rights, is vastly more improved under the terms and conditions of this bill than if it were relegated back to the present warring conditions prevailing between labor and invested capital.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. I assume the Senator does not argue that even though the Senate were to accept the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky we would be going back all the way on the road to the original status of labor and capital vis-à-vis.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I could come to no conclusion about that until I saw the final action of the Senate. The Senate might strike out all the labor clauses of the bill and put something else in their place, but it might not. I think that the fundamental provision in this bill which is going to work out a result is the one that if arbitration fails, if conciliation fails, a board of men appointed by the President of the United States, representing the American people, assumed to be free from bias and prejudice on either side, shall sit in final judgment and determine what is a fair wage, not between labor and capital but a fair wage between labor and the public that pays the bill. I do not know of anything that would be a greater backward step for the Congress of the United States to take to-day than to abandon the efforts made during the Great War by the Government and its Government boards to see that labor was justly and fairly compensated and avoid the debacle of strike conditions and strike out the labor provisions of this bill. That is what it means.

How many strikes were adjusted during the Great War because there were in existence boards similar to those set up in this bill? Can anyone say that labor was unjustly treated, that the Government wronged the labor of the United States in the trial of these matters? I think not. I say the man who predicts that a board representing the Government of the United States can not do justice to labor doubts the very fundamental principle on which our Government is established, doubts the ability of our Government to do justice between man and man and preserve the liberties of the American people.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator states that certain boards of conciliation were successful—and they were successful—in preventing dislocations between labor and capital during the war. If in the stress of war the Government was able by the use of boards exercising purely moral suasion to prevent those troubles, does not the Senator think that the same power and boards clothed with the same authority ought to do it in time of profound peace?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I understand that the Senator from Kentucky is objecting to Congress writing this legislation on the statute books.

Mr. STANLEY. I have no objection to such boards as were organized during the war. I have no objection, and in fact I think it is wise, that the President should name, as President Roosevelt did, boards to hear differences between these people, as the President named a board the other day. As long as the Government moves by moral force and appeals to public opinion, and gives publicity to any unjust demands made by either labor or capital, that is perfectly proper. But when the Government ceases to appeal to the moral sense of a free citizen and attempts to deprive him of a hitherto inalienable right by lodging him in jail, that is a different thing. That is not conciliation; that is compulsion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is the first time I have ever heard my friend from Kentucky argue in favor of a government of men, and not a government of law—argue against the fact that the law of the land is, or should be, the highest ideal of moral suasion to the people.

Mr. STANLEY. I think it would be better for the law to provide for boards of conciliation. I am not objecting to that. Does the Senator from Alabama argue that the Presidents of the United States in time of war, or even in time of peace, have violated any law in suggesting these boards?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, not at all.

Mr. STANLEY. There is one right that is higher than even the mandate of a law, and that is a natural right.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama will concede that there is a new blend in the old doctrine held on the other side of the aisle. He ought not to challenge the Senator from Kentucky on that ground.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be; but I am not willing to concede that for my friend from Kentucky. I have served in the ranks with him too long. Hard cases drive us sometimes to hard points; but I know the simon-pure democracy of the Senator from Kentucky as few other men know it, and I do not doubt it at the test point. But my friend from Kentucky is not moving merely to strike out the punitive features of this bill; he is proposing in his motion to strike out the entire sections relating to labor, the clauses relating to arbitration, the clauses relating to a Government board of adjustment, as well as those sections which provide that a man who interferes with the movement of the commerce of the country shall commit a crime.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I am sure that my just friend, the Senator from Alabama, would not attribute to this motion a motive which did not inspire the maker of it, although the Senator might be warranted in coming to that conclusion from the fact that there was a motion to strike out. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I have no objection to boards of conciliation and arbitration; that my motion to strike out all these provisions was for the reason that in the first place I objected to the compulsory and punitive provisions contained in the thirtieth and thirty-first sections, and that, in my opinion, the other provisions are too cumbrous and embrace a mass of details that are not necessary; that I have no objection to the principle involved and simply believe that the end can be attained by a simpler process and less machinery.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I say to my friend—I am sure that is his position—that if that is the case, he should not by his motion seek to deprive the American people of the privilege granted them by the terms of this bill without proposing within the bill some other means of taking care of this situation. We may differ about the question of saying to a man, "You shall not strike"; but I am sure we can not differ about the proposition that if it was just and right for Mr. Roosevelt, as President of the United States, or for Mr. Wilson, as President of the United States, to propose a system of arbitration and award to take care of particular instances of strikes, and to reach an adjustment that would attempt to avoid injury to labor and capital and the public as well—because I do not know of any cases where the Presidents of the United States have exercised their high authority as first citizens of the land to avoid labor disputes except in those cases where the public was involved——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I seldom differ with my friend from Alabama, and always when I do with reluctance, and usually with regret, and I see a happy opportunity now, as the Good Book says, to "agree with thine adversary quickly, while in the way with him." Now, I am perfectly willing to amend this motion of mine, and provide simply for the elimination of the punitive features, eliminate the jail and the prison and the fine, and leave the conciliation and arbitration boards unaffected, if he will support that amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that I hope, from the position he takes, he will undoubtedly do that. I think that is the material part of this bill, not the punitive features; but I think the part of this bill that protects the public is the fact that you are going to have a Government board standing here to do justice in these matters. I do not believe that any man can lead the great mass of American labor to strike unless injustice has been done them, or they are led to believe that injustice has been done them.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one second. I believe that if you have a fair and just Government board, which we must assume will justly decide these questions of labor and capital and the burdens under them, it will in the main prevent strikes in the future; and therefore I hope the Senator, unless he is going to propose some other amendment as a substitute for those sections of the bill, will not move to strike them out, because we are in accord on those features of the bill.

I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the colloquy between the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Kentucky, and the tender on the part of the Senator from Kentucky leads me to ask if the Senator from Alabama will not anticipate a little and give his judgment on the amendment which I have offered, and of which I am in part, and only in part, the author.

Mr. STANLEY. Right at that point, Mr. President, pursuant to what the Senator from Alabama has said, I did not care to be put in the position which was justly warranted on the part of the Senator from Alabama, because I moved to strike out all of these provisions, and he had a perfect right to conclude that I was opposed to the principle of the thing that I proposed to eliminate. That, however, was not the thought in my mind. I am of the opinion, however, as I explained in a rather elaborate address before this body a day or two ago, that the English system of boards of conciliation in large establishments, made up of equal numbers of employers and employees, without making the organization of that labor a condition precedent, and allowing either union or nonunion labor to avail themselves of the services of such boards, is more feasible than the measure hinted at by the committee or the measure definitely outlined by the House of Representatives. It is not my purpose to oppose the very laudable endeavor on the part of the committee and the laudable purpose on the part of the people of this country, both capital and labor, to adjust industrial dislocations by every possible method of arbitration and conciliation, because the strike is to industrial peace what the battle is to political warfare—a dernier, and usually an indefensible, resort.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure; and that is the reason why I think we ought to put something in its place, because that battle field goes over the homes of America; that battle field rests on the heart of America; and the Congress of the United States can not do its full duty to the American people and let that battle field rest where it is.

I do not think that there is any man on the Committee on Interstate Commerce who has any dogmatic views about the provisions of this bill in reference to the labor dispute. The committee have been attempting to work out a higher ideal. The bill must yet go to conference. All these provisions may yet be changed in conference. What I say is that if a man believes in those ideals he ought either to let these provisions go to conference or he ought to propose something better in their place.

Now I will answer the Senator from Illinois. Since the Senator offered his amendment I have not had an opportunity to read it, and therefore I am not sure whether or not I have in mind exactly what he intends. But I will state what I understand his amendment to be. I understand that his proposal is substantially what has been known in the past as the Canadian arbitration law.

Mr. McCORMICK. In good part.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was my understanding.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me add, if I may, that it amends the provisions of the bill as reported from the committee by qualifying the prohibition against strikes. It would prohibit a strike until after a period following the rendering of a decision by the board.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the provisions of the Canadian law, because I have read those a good many times, and in what I am saying now I may make a mistake in reference to the Senator's amendments, because I am talking now about the Canadian law. If it does not apply to his amendment I hope he will correct me.

In the first place, my objection to the Canadian law as a substitute for the provisions of this bill is that they are only temporary. They are helpful, or supposed to be helpful; at least they are an effort along the right line. But they are not conclusive. They stop the strike by force of arms until arbitration takes place, and then after arbitration takes place a certain time is allowed to expire, and then the battle can go on. I think the time has come when the battle should cease, and that is what I stand for. The Canadian provisions, as offered as a substitute for this clause, leave out of the equation the principal party to it, the party who pays the bill.

The Canadian law provides for an arbitration board, to be selected on the one hand by labor and on the other hand by capital, and they are to decide the terms of employment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, it leaves the labor boards and the transportation board as they are in the bill, the transportation board representing the public and having, as I understand it, the final decision.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, as I stated in my remarks a minute ago, I have not read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, and I was addressing myself to the Canadian law, because I understood it was modeled on that; and, as I stated, my objection to the Canadian law was that it represented only labor and capital and had no representation for the public; and yet in railroad disputes no man can contend today that the shipping public does not pay the bill, and every material increase in the wages of labor must be reflected into the pockets of the American public or the railroads would go into the bankruptcy court.

Of course, if the Senator's amendment provides that in the end there shall be a final board representing the Government, appointed to represent the American people, then this criticism would not apply to his amendment. I have not read it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I interpose a word at that point?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have read the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] as well as that of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and there is no substantial difference between the two amendments. While they take on, in a general way, the form of the Canadian statute, they are not at all similar so far as the proposition of the board or boards to make investigations is concerned. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois leaves our boards, as stated in this bill, just as they are now; and the essential difference is this—and I will read that part of the amendment so that the Senator from Alabama can have that difference in mind. This is after the board or boards have considered the dispute and have issued a recommendation or decision, whatever you may be pleased to call it. It does not bind anybody so far as the future is concerned, either railway company or employee. It proceeds:

> Any carrier subject to this act which shall, for the purpose of enforcing or supporting its position or contention with respect to any demand made by its employees relating to terms of employment, discharge, suspend, or deny employment to any of its employees prior to or within 60 days after the publication of the report of the board respecting the matter in dispute.

That takes care of the carrier. Then it provides:

> And any employee of a carrier subject to this act who ceases or quits work in combination with other employees thereof, prior to or within 60 days after the publication of such report, for the purpose of inducing or compelling such carrier to grant or continue to grant terms of employment, or for the purpose of helping other employees to induce or compel their employer to grant or continue to grant terms of employment, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

The essential part of it is that the Government boards go forward and make the investigations. They issue a recommendation with regard to the dispute, I assume as to the merits of the dispute, and then for a period of 30 days the carriers can not discharge the employees on account of the dispute, and the employees can not cease to work, in combination, on account of the dispute. But at the end of 30 days both the carrier and the employees are at perfect liberty to renew their struggle, and one can lock out the employees, and the other can enter into combination and suspend the commerce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was my understanding of the Canadian law. But the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] suggested that in this amendment they provided for the same arbitration and the same final board of adjustment that is provided in this bill. I am not informed about that. Can the Senator from Iowa inform me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true.

Mr. McCORMICK. That is true. The amendment makes only two substantive changes. The first limits the period within which the board and the committees now created by the bill may have the dispute under consideration, in order that it may not be interminably drawn out; the second fixes a time after the final decision of the board before which it shall be illegal to strike under the terms of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say, in reference to the amendment of the Senator as I understand it, I would prefer to have his amendment than no legislation at all; but if it is a good thing to prevent a strike temporarily—and it is—why is it not a good thing to prevent it entirely? If this can be worked out justly as a temporary matter by a Government board and boards of arbitration, why can it not be worked out as the final conclusion? That is the question. If it can, why should we limit the process? It is either right or it is wrong in principle. It is either right or it is wrong in justice to the men who are earning their daily wage on these railroads. It is either right or it is wrong so far as the American public is concerned; and if it is right in part for temporary purposes, then it seems to me the conclusion is irresistible that it is right in whole and should be adopted for the final conclusion.

There is nothing in this bill that prevents any man from quitting work if he does not enjoy it. If he thinks he can get a better wage or more satisfactory employment somewhere else, there is nothing within the folds of this bill that stands in his way. The only thing in this bill, if you bring it down to its last analysis, and eliminate all the preliminary procedure of arbitration and leading up to the question of final conclusion, is that a Government board, appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, representing the hundred million people of this country, entirely free from bias on the side either of capital or labor, shall determine what is a fair and just wage to the men who carry the commerce of this country, and then reflect that determination back into the freight and passenger rates, and make it a charge against the shipping public of America, and I might say the consuming public of America. That is all there is in this bill.

But, like any other law that is in the interest of the people, the bill says that if you do not comply with the law, the Government makes you comply with the law. What does that mean? That means that any man in railroad employ in the future, if the terms of this bill are adopted, who is not satisfied with his wage or his working conditions, can carry his complaint to the Government tribunal without let or hindrance from anybody. He does not have to be the tool of a labor organization or of a railroad company. He can exercise his own individual rights, and have the Government determine what is a fair and just wage. I say that there is no danger of the Government doing injustice to this great body of citizens of America. This is a republican Government, a free Government. The men whose wage scale will be tried in this Government court cast 2,000,000 votes in the American Republic. Is it at all probable, under those conditions, that the finding of that board is going to be unjust and inequitable in their behalf?

I think not. If there is any bias to be expected on either side, it will fall on the side of the employee, naturally, but in the end it will be a check against any inordinate increase of wages that must be reflected into the freight rates that must be paid by the American people.

My friend, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], was contending with me on the floor a day or two ago that possibly an increase in the freight rates of America might mean an increased charge to the American public of five times the amount of that increased rate. I am going to apply his own argument to himself, that where we charge $1 more for freight the consuming American public must pay $5 before its food and its clothes come to its homes.

Mr. STANLEY. That was an inquiry, not an assertion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It had been asserted by others, and I am just going to bring those coals home to Newcastle.

There is no theory about the proposition which I am now going to state. Since 1916 and largely during the period of the Great War the wage of the railroad workers of America has increased a billion dollars. That is no theory; that is a fact. A billion dollars! If those who contend that increasing freight rates $1 reflects $5 into the cost of the product when it reaches the ultimate consumer are correct, then we are to believe that the increase of $1,000,000,000 in the labor wage of the American railroad employees was instantly reflected into the freight rates because it could not be paid anywhere else.

The Director General of Railroads increased the freight rates 25 per cent and the passenger rates 50 per cent throughout America. He made a greater increase than that, because he changed classifications in many particulars that amounted to an increase in freight rates. So that the extent that the wage scale went up was reflected into the pockets of the men who ship the freight.

That being the case, is it contended that that billion dollars' increase in wages reflects $5,000,000,000 in the pockets of the American people? If it does, we have some idea of where, at least in part, the increased cost to the American people comes from.

The question of wage scale is not settled. I am not going to pass on the contention as to whether it is right or wrong. I am not informed. It is not my place to pass on it. But we know that the men engaged in the railroad world to-day are insisting now that there shall be a further increase in wages. They may be right or they may be wrong. If that wage increase is anything in proportion to the last one, then it would mean another billion dollars, and if the argument about freight rates as made by some here is correct, it would mean reflecting into the pockets of the consuming masses of American people another $5,000,000,000.

Now, can the Congress of the United States, because it wants to be just to labor, because it wants to be fair to labor, ignore labor itself, ignore the clerk in the countinghouse, the ditch digger in the street, the man on the scaffold building the great buildings of America, the laborer on the farm, and say that an organization in the United States composed of not over 2,000,000 men can reflect their will and through the power of the threatened strike force billions of dollars into the cost of living of the American people?

That is the issue at which I am looking. I do not stand here holding a brief against labor. I know that when labor ceases to battle upward the Nation is dead; but when one class of labor, one clan in the great body politic of labor, desires to reserve to itself the right to stand independent of the Government, to exercise its right or the so-called privilege to strike in order that it may enforce additional burdens on the masses of the American people, then, I say, the time and place have come when it is the duty of the Government of the United States to function in the matter.

Do not tear down class or clan. I am not in favor of destroying union labor. I think union organization has done great things for labor, and sometimes it has done great injury to labor. I am not with union labor when it seeks to make the closed shop and deny to other men the right to work. I am not with union labor when it says by force of arms, the force of the power to strike, that "we can invade the party politic and make the American public pay the price, right or wrong." I am not with union labor then, but I am with union labor when it says, "We are entitled to social justice."

That is the high ideal of all labor, the uplifting of the home, the education of children, the upbuilding of society—all that is theirs, justly theirs; but it is in keeping with the exercise of the brutal power of the savage to strike down other men with a blow in order that they may take home what they have, regardless of the right or the justice in the case. When you say that labor has the right to exercise or bring about a universal railroad strike in the country, to starve the American people into submission in order that it may dictate to them its will and put its penalties on the backs of the American people, then I draw the line and I will not go with you.

If that is the case, if that is the justice of the cause, I say, give them a Government board to decide what is a just wage, and I will go with you as far as you can go to see that that board is just and fair and equitable. Then I say that the decision of that board is written into the law of the land, and I am prepared to send to jail the man who defies its conclusions, like I am prepared to send to jail the man who defies the law of the land.

The great sustaining policy of the American Republic is its just laws, and they can only be just to all by all upholding them. How are we to uphold them? We can not uphold the law by appealing merely to the conscience of men to obey the law. Most men obey the law because they respect it, but some men are highwaymen and obey no law except by the force of the strong arm of the Government.

If you have worked out abstract justice through courts of arbitration and the final court of the Government to solve the question in the interest of labor and have protected the American public against unjust demands, and at the same time have left labor free to exercise its individual liberty and quit employment when it elects, so long as it does not defy the law, then I say that you have, as this bill does, responded to all the demands of abstract justice, and the man who defies it stands in defiance of the law and, like other lawbreakers, should be punished.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion of the bill as constantly as my other duties have permitted. It has been presented to the consideration of the Senate by those familiar with its character and who have framed it after many months of long, anxious, and exhaustive consideration. I do not think any measure was ever presented to the consideration of the Senate, with the possible exception of some of our revenue bills, which has received more attention than has been devoted to this one by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce.

This body owes a lasting debt of gratitude to the committee for its earnest and laborious effort to solve one of the most complex and important problems which this Congress must solve. The theory of the bill was presented very ably and exhaustively by the chairman of the committee, and however much one may differ from his conclusions or from the basis of the details of the bill, he will give him due credit for a thorough understanding of the subject and for reviewing the action of the committee that would have been most edifying to every Member of the Senate had they attended and listened to his statement.

I am not satisfied, Mr. President, with this measure. It contains many features which do not appeal to my judgment. If I were to frame a bill covering its subject matter I should certainly eliminate some of its features and include some which are absent from it. I realize, however, that those in charge of the subject are far better informed than I am regarding its details, and that the bill is the result of their composite effort to reach some basis of legislation reasonably just in its provisions and which may command our approval, although reluctantly given.

Since the bill has been pending I have endeavored to outline some provisions more acceptable to myself, but I have not been able to reach a conclusion which, in my judgment, would command the vote of a majority of this body. Concretely, I should like to see the railroads returned to their owners with a Government guaranty against loss and for a revenue equivalent to that provided for in the existing law for a 12-month period of time after the roads were thus transferred.

I believe that such an arrangement, simple in character, might be so far successful as to enable the Congress in the interval between its enactment and its maturity to supplement it with such legislation as the experience of that interval might require.

I am also wedded to the theory of regional incorporation, and for reasons which I have not the time to present. I dislike the limit of compensation, because it seems inconsistent with the competitive principle.

There are, however, obvious reasons for that arrangement, and particularly in view of the conditions under which the Congress justified the taking over of the roads. These constitute a contract between the people of the United States and the owners of the railroad property, a contract which we have observed and which we should, as an honest Nation, continue to observe. Whatever we may say regarding the manner in which railroad property has been acquired and the infamies which have at times attended its mismanagement, we must recognize that vast sums of money have been invested in the creation and operation of our great systems of transportation, and that, as property, it is as much subject to the protection of our laws and is as much entitled to proper consideration as any other species of property.

On the 21st day of March, 1919, "an act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," was approved by the President. The first section of that act, among other things, recites—

> That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation an annual sum—

And so forth.

It was also provided that written agreements should be executed between the Government and the owners of the railroads providing among other things for the manner of their return.

> Every such agreement shall also contain adequate and appropriate provisions for the maintenance, repair, renewals, and depreciation of the property, for the creation of any reserves or reserve funds found necessary in connection therewith, and for such accounting and adjustments of charges and payments, both during and at the end of Federal control, as may be requisite in order that the property of each carrier may be returned to it in substantially as good repair and in substantially as complete equipment as it was in at the beginning of Federal control—

And so forth.

I take that to mean that the President must return, and under its terms he has contracted that the roads shall be returned, in as good condition as they were received, to do which the pending legislation or some legislation of similar character is necessary.

It must also be carried in mind that the acquisition of the roads by the Government was for war purposes, justified by war's necessities and made essential because of the crisis through which the Nation was then passing. With the subsidence of the necessity, the need for the roads having passed, they should be returned to the owners. A limit of time was fixed for that purpose, which, as I recall, was to be within a period of 21 months after the return of peace between the United States and the Central Empires.

We did not, therefore, take the roads from their owners for the purpose of keeping them permanently; we did not take them in pursuance of a previously agreed-upon policy; we did not propose to substitute Government ownership for private ownership and control. We simply did what any nation has the right to do, what any individual similarly situated has the right to do—we took them because of the need for our self-preservation, for our safety, and for exigencies which at that time menaced the public welfare.

We have been in possession of them for a period of practically two years. The war in the interval has been brought to a termination, so far as active hostilities are concerned, and this is one of the vexing problems resulting from it and with which we are called upon to deal.

Mr. President, believing that the committee having charge of the bill, cognizant of the magnitude of the problems involved, and inspired by a sincere desire to serve the country and this body, have given to the subject that exhaustive consideration which its importance requires, unless I can suggest something better, unless it is possible for me to devise some plan of return that will appeal to a majority of the Members of this body more completely than that which the committee has worked out, it is my duty to support it. It is for that reason that I have determined, except as some amendments are concerned, to take chances upon this measure, knowing that if it should prove defective or unworkable in any of its details we have at all times the power to improve by the process of amendment or elimination wherever it may be necessary to improve or to eliminate as time shall pass. We must make a beginning somewhere, and no scheme can be devised, no plan can be prepared, that will escape serious and substantial criticism and objection, however long the time we may devote to such a purpose, and however confident we may be of our ability to accomplish it.

When I was a young man, Mr. President, a bill for the resumption of specie payments was enacted, as I recall, in the year 1874. It provided for a resumption of specie payments in 1879. From the end of the Civil War to the enactment of that measure the country was torn by the issue of specie resumption. It became so acute that it ultimated in the creation of one of those temporary political parties which have punctuated the history of the United States—the Greenback Party—a party which had much of good in its purposes and much of logic in its platform; a party which made severe inroads into the ranks of the two great historic political organizations, and which largely influenced the discussions of that tremendously important measure. It was predicted that with the disappearance of the existing monetary system by the operation of the resumption act the country would encounter a panic of unprecedented dimensions; that business would become bankrupt, manufacturing stagnate, and hundreds of thousands of men would be thrown out of employment. Among others, Mr. President, I believed, possibly because the party to which I then and now belong opposed the measure, that many of these anticipated troubles would ensue in consequence of this legislation. But it went into effect; all efforts to repeal or to postpone it failed; and while it created a transient disturbance, while some features of business and of industry were more or less affected, it easily became an established fact, and demonstrated the unwisdom of attributing too much importance and too perilous consequences to a scheme of legislation deemed experimental in its character. We soon perceived it as one of the wisest and most desirable pieces of legislation following the establishment of peace, and it did more to settle and systematize the business of the country than perhaps any other single financial measure since 1865.

When I hear some of the objections presented to this measure, and when some of them occur to me, I comfort myself with the reflection that they may perhaps prove to be quite as ephemeral as those of 1879. Doubtless other items of legislation have been similarly opposed, and the consequences of whose operation have been similarly satisfactory. So I shall take the good with the bad, trusting to the future for the satisfactory outcome of the measure.

I know that under our agreement with the owners of this property it is our duty to live up to our covenant in all particulars. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] led the fight in this body against that part of the present railroad law which fixed the compensation for the use of the roads. He convinced me that the rate was entirely too high, and I still think he was right about it; but the Senate disagreed with him, the House disagreed with him, the bill was passed over that and other objections, and when it became written into the laws of the United States controversy ceased to exist and compliance with its requirements became a public duty.

The Senator has spent the last six months in a concrete effort to perform that agreement in the interest of the American people without doing injustice to any of its component parts; and I think under the circumstances he has done as well as, if not better than, any other man in this body could have done, because he has given years of anxious study and consideration to every feature of the great problem of public transportation and is justly considered a high authority upon the subject.

But, Mr. President, I have said more than necessary in a general way regarding this bill. I perhaps should from the outset have addressed myself to the sections which are covered by the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. That directly concerns the operation of the property.

We are all agreed, we must be agreed, that transportation is a governmental function. It is the inseparable adjunct of our modern economic, industrial, political, and social life. The Senator from Kentucky has likened it, and very properly so, to the circulatory system of the human body, and there is no other simile which so simply and graphically illustrates its relation to the body politic. We have in this country nearly 300,000 miles of railroad, far more than that which exists in any other section of the globe.

It supplies a country of diversified climate and industries, occupying all the space between two great oceans, covering an entire continent, and, in width, the greater part of the Temperate Zone. It is inhabited by 110,000,000 people, living under a republican form of government, enjoying the blessings of free institutions, and mutually interdependent for their common prosperity. Each section contributes not only to the comforts but to the necessities of every other, and does so through and by means of the medium of physical transportation. Without such a system the country must languish, if, indeed, it does not retrograde. Without such a system the great cities of the country never would have risen and expanded; and perhaps it might not have been an unmixed evil had they been restricted to a much less degree of population and area than they now cover—but we have them. A majority of the people of the United States, perhaps—certainly in most of the States—are urban and consequently crowded into the centers of population. The world carries a very small amount of extra rations upon its back, and that part of the world inhabiting these great centers has practically no extra rations in stock. If you paralyze the system of transportation, if you interfere with the normal intercourse due to the running of trains, you not only seriously embarrass the welfare of these great masses of people but, continued for a short length of time, it will visit upon them all of the horrors of cold and starvation.

I might say in passing that this is one of the facts upon which the bolshevistic spirit counts, believing that the production of such a situation creates a fertile soil for the propaganda of blood and destruction which they preach and always practice when they can; and, of course, it is perfectly natural that large bodies of men and women deprived of sustenance should bitterly complain. It is perfectly natural that they do not stop to reason as to the why and wherefore of their condition, but demand relief, and demand it instantly. Moreover, Mr. President, the commercial interests of the country as to things material but not absolutely necessary to the sustaining of physical life—they, too, are dependent upon our system of transportation, and bankruptcy will confront them when it ceases to operate.

There is not a phase of modern civilization which is not bound up in our modern systems of transportation of merchandise and of intelligence. Therefore no man can safely challenge the proposition that it is a public function which it is the bounden duty of the Government to continue in full operation at whatever hazard. The trains must move; hence the franchise given to the corporation requires continuous operation and inflicts a penalty of forfeiture as a punishment for neglect of that duty, whatever the reason for the failure.

Inasmuch as unlimited private control of transportation in America has proven a failure, fraught with every element of discrimination, speculation, and abuse, the Government long since stretched forth its hand and exercised control over the operation of these huge concerns, and in some degree has been able to minimize these evils in the interest of the general public.

We speak of the general public frequently in this Chamber, and sometimes in terms that are as broad as humanity, which is correct; but we do not always emphasize just what general public is meant in connection with a problem of this character.

Men and women of a certain age exercise political power in this country, but do not constitute all of our population, perhaps not 50 per cent of it. Those under age and the stranger within our midst, temporarily or permanently, constitute as well a part of the general public. In other words, every man, every woman, every child within the limits of the American Republic has an interest in transportation, is in some degree dependent upon it, and must in some degree suffer in proportion as this element is interfered with or fails to function.

It is an old but true aphorism that the welfare of the people is the supreme law. It is a law, Mr. President, so supreme that it overrides constitutions and statutes whenever the latter fail to accomplish that end. A supreme law is a law over everything, like the law of self-preservation, and that supreme law demands the interchange of commodities, the constant movement of trains and of vessels, so that our active physical life may at all times and everywhere be given the proper consideration and attention.

If I am right, then by it we must measure our duty to the public in the enactment of this bill, and wherever any interest, I care not how extensive it may be, conflicts with that supreme one, and they can not be reconciled, it must give way in the public interest to the extent that such interest makes it necessary.

In legislation of this sort, what are the elements? First, the great body of the people, as I have said, and, secondary to that, these other elements—ownership, management, operation. I do not state them in the order of their importance. They are equally important. They are like faith, hope, and charity. We must name them consecutively, because we can not name them otherwise. But they are equally important, and none more so than the other.

The owners of the railroads have demanded certain things from our committee. They are not satisfied with this bill. Away down in their hearts many of them would like to go back to the good old days, when the ownership of the railroad, represented by its officials, dictated the terms to that section of the country subject to their distribution, and consequently to their domination. Management is not satisfied, because management sees in Government control the imposition of limitations, to them perhaps disastrous in their operation, but in any event interfering with their free exercise of discretion.

The great body of individuals whom we call the employees are not satisfied, because they contend for the right to operate the roads or not as they may see fit, their action being determined by what they conceive to be their interests at any particular time.

Here, then, Mr. President, are three elements entering into the matter of actual operation which we can not hope to satisfy, no matter what we do. Unfortunately their relations are not always cordial, although frequently cooperating. But each of them possesses an element of interest which in its judgment should predominate over the other elements, and unless they so predominate they feel and fear, with greater or less conviction, that injury or possible disaster may come to them.

Mr. President, we can not divorce ourselves from sympathy or prejudice, or both, toward one or more of these contending elements. Human nature is not sufficiently perfect to enable any man to act with strict impartiality regarding great questions of this kind, no matter how earnestly and honestly and seriously he may endeavor to do so. We must make allowances for the frailties of human nature, and it is for that reason that practically all legislation must be compromised.

But we can reason together in the effort to do the best we can for everybody interested, and if we fail after such effort we will at least have the consolation of knowing that we did our best.

That brings me, Mr. President, to an immediate consideration of the subject matter of this amendment. It is directed to a scheme of proposed legislation which is deemed essential to the constant operation of an indispensable system and to enforce a duty resting upon the employee in the discharge of his portion of the general scheme for the welfare of the public. It declares strikes to be unlawful, and, prohibiting them, it seeks to provide machinery whereby the rights of those affected can be safeguarded nevertheless.

Mr. President, if we have no right to do it, or if by doing it we trench upon the fundamental, inalienable rights of the individual, as guaranteed to him by the laws and Constitution of his country, then, without regard to the consequences to the body politic, I presume we should not do it. But if, on the other hand, we are guilty of no such transgression and are at the same time convinced that this, or something which is its equivalent, must be done if the well-being of the country is to be safeguarded, then, in my judgment, we fail in the discharge of our duty if we fail in affirmative action.

It has been said, Mr. President, by a number of Senators, and frequently insisted outside of the Chamber, that the right to strike is an inalienable one, or, as some express it, an inviolable one. If by that is meant the right to work or not to work, I concede it, although we have laws in almost every State of the Union punishing men for vagrancy. We are told by Holy Writ that in the sweat of his brow shall man eat bread, and our forefathers in legislation, taking that literally, provided punishments for those who were without employment and had no visible means of support. Unfortunately, such laws have been very largely honored in the breach rather than in the observance for some time, and convictions for vagrancy are few and far between. I mention it, Mr. President, as emphasizing the proposition that even the right to refrain from work is not an inalienable right, but is measured and limited by the dependence which refraining from work brings to the individual and makes him a burden on society.

But I concede that there is not, there should not be, and there can not be, a law in America requiring a man to work if he does not want to. Nor can there be a law to restrain a man from working when he does want to; although unhappily in practice we know that all over the country and for years past men have been prevented from working, men have been mutilated for working, men have been murdered for working, their only offense being the exercise of the right of an American citizen. That is an inalienable right, also, and one which it is the duty of the legislator and executor to protect at all times quite as much as the other.

Whether a strike is an inalienable right, Mr. President, depends upon what we mean when we use the term.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying and only regret that a greater number of the Members of the Senate have not given the attention to this debate which he has. Its importance justifies it. I think at this point the Senator from Colorado has struck the crux of the whole controversy. It is what Lord Bacon would call a legomica. It arises from a misunderstanding of a term that is capable of two contradictory interpretations.

The trouble is that the term "strike" to one man means an entirely different thing from what it does to another, and I wish to call the Senator's attention to a very apt definition of strike as given by Sir James Hannen, in the case of Farrer against Close.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is reading from the Arthur case?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall refer to that in a moment.

Mr. STANLEY. He says:

> I am, however, of the opinion that strikes are not necessarily illegal. A strike is properly defined as a simultaneous cessation of work on the part of workmen.

Do I understand the Senator from Colorado to claim that a simultaneous cessation of work on the part of workmen doing a strictly personal service, whether the master be delegated to operate a public common carrier or a mill, should be punished as an offense carrying the opprobrium that imprisonment always carries, if it goes no further than the negative act of refusal further to assist in the movement of interstate commerce?

Mr. THOMAS. I might answer that query Yankeelike, by asking if the Senator ever knew of such a strike in all his existence, but I will not do that.

Mr. STANLEY. I am perfectly willing to answer that question.

Mr. THOMAS. Very good.

Mr. STANLEY. There are a great number of so-called strikes in which there has been practically no breach of the peace or interference with nonunion labor. The late strike in the coal industry, bad as it is, has been remarkably free from such a thing. But I am perfectly willing to admit exactly what the Senator claims, that the right—and I believe it is a right, and Justice Harlan in the Oakes case says so explicitly—of workmen to simultaneously cease or quit the service of their employer is seldom unaccompanied by indefensible acts of injury to private property and to the persons of volunteer workmen not within the organization. I am of the opinion that that is the line the law should draw and that the courts should draw.

I am of the opinion that any interference with persons engaged in interstate commerce, either by a combination of workmen or by individuals, is an offense in the nature of an insurrection, a blow at the public good rather than at personal property and personal interests, and that any interference whatever with the voluntary employees or with the property of a common carrier should be subject to much heavier pains and penalties than like offenses against a private individual or private property. I believe that the law should be drawn with that idea in view, and I believe that any act like the present act—and I think the Senator from Colorado, with his splendid power of analysis, will agree with me—that scrambles and conglomerates this simultaneous cessation from employment with acts of insurrection and violence, is necessarily abortive and impotent, because if it is severe enough to punish these breaches of the peace and these criminal interferences with the movement of interstate commerce, it is too severe to be inflicted upon a mere cessation from employment, and if such a cessation is an offense such penalties as may be inflicted upon that offense would be too weak to deter bold and desperate criminals who would attempt to assail conductors and firemen or to blow up bridges and dismantle engines.

I hope the Senator will differentiate in that line, and I bespeak his cooperation and his able assistance in securing legislation that does make this necessary and essential discrimination.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. President, I shall try to answer the Senator's question directly. First, let me say that his definition, like all definitions of a word so comprehensive in its character, is not, in my judgment, complete, although I am perfectly willing to concede that it is as complete as any.

My answer would be, and I base it upon the decision from which the quotation was made, that if the strike which the Senator supposes is a spontaneous affair and goes no further it is beyond the power of the statutes to regulate. But if it is one of the overt acts of a conspiracy or agreement to strike for the purpose of accomplishing some common object, then it does fall within the powers of the legislator to provide against, just as any other conspiracy.

Mr. STANLEY. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator again——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. But right at that point I think he has probably come to a conclusion on such legislation. There is this difference between the law of conspiracy as commonly applied or between the application of the law to those cases to which the authors of the law originally tended and its necessary application to modern conditions.

The law of conspiracy as originally framed—and it is wise, as all laws that are as old and established by the experience of courts and centuries are wise—in the main meant to reach all parties who cooperated in some illegal act. If any number of men agreed to injure the person or property of another, commit some breach of peace, some fairly ascertainable or admitted wrong, then the law could be applied with justice whether the parties are the immediate actors or whether they render some collateral assistance.

But here is the basic difficulty, and I have given it some thought, about the application of the broad and generally just principles of conspiracy to organizations of this character. Here is an organization of 2,000,000 men, in the nature almost of a corporate organization. They are separated by thousands of miles. They comprise every character of citizenship. A vote is taken among 300,000 conductors and firemen and engineers, we will say, that unless certain conditions are met they will all quit work.

Those men are notified in California, in Florida, in Maine, that the head of the brotherhood, the competent and authorized executive, has directed every engineer to leave his cab at a given hour, and 300,000 men quit. In the city of Pittsburgh a hotheaded railroader, resenting that some volunteer or scab, as he calls him, is going to take charge of his engine, hits him with a club. If you apply the law against the conspiracy, as the Senator is now applying it, every man engaged in railroading in the United States is guilty of participating in that assault and in law he is guilty, and yet the Senator from Colorado knows and I know that neither the conscience nor the common sense of the American people will permit the infliction of the punishment which the law authorizes, with the inevitable result that the law is brought into disrepute.

It is true, as the Senator has so well said, and he is usually right, that strikes have an almost universal concomitant of lawlessness and violence; but the people who engage in the strike are the multitude in many cases and those who commit the occasional acts of violence are irresponsible individuals, who, as a rule, indulge in this character of lawlessness which is utterly indefensible and in opposition to the desire and the purposes in many instances of the very men who order the cessation of employment.

For that reason, in my humble opinion, it is absolutely necessary in this effort to protect the movement of interstate commerce, and in that I join most heartily with the Senator from Colorado, that sound legislation be drawn—it must be drawn; it is not a difficult thing to do—differentiating between the pains and penalities inflicted upon those who affirmatively interfere with the movement of commerce, and those inflicted against those who obey the order of some superior officer in simply desisting from employment. The bill, to my utter amazement, having failed everywhere else, as it ought to fail, has made a discriminating, unwise, indefensible hodgepodge and scramble of these simple distinctions.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky as to the effect of the law in the instances to which he refers. I am painfully aware, as all men must be, that conspiracies of any sort may become broad enough to ripen into riots, riots into insurrections, insurrections into rebellions, rebellions into revolutions, if they are successful. If the Senator's argument, therefore, be a cogent one, it would seem that whenever the act sought to be prevented is participated in by a very large number of people, some other method of legal solution should be sought for and applied. I think that may be true. I do not know whether this legislation will prove practically operative at all times. Frankly, I have my doubts about it, for several reasons. I had intended to have spoken about that later, but I might as well do so now.

In the first place, there is the physical power of the organizations, which, as the Senator says, are scattered all over the United States. That power may be exercised in many ways, and effectually. Then there is the political power of the organizations, the one power to which Members of Congress are inclined to bow at all times, if they can only discover where it is and whither it tends; and that is local as well as national in its operation and influence. Then, again, there may be the impossibility of the application of any system or scheme of laws to vast numbers of men determined to disregard it. Resort must be had to the ultima ratio of all governments, which is force. However, must we because of these possibilities shrink from the performance of our duty here in the enactment of such legislation as seems to be all we can accomplish to keep these great avenues of transportation open and constantly in operation? If the Government can not do that, it is a failure, because unable to perform one of the public obligations resting upon it and which it must discharge or abdicate.

What would be thought of a provision in this proposed law which even directly permitted the owners of the railways to cease operating their trains upon them? What would be thought of any government that would permit the owners to announce a certain schedule of rates and to serve notice upon the public that unless such rates were accepted on the first day of the following month all trains upon the system would cease operation until they were accepted? What would be thought of a scheme of legislation which should interpose no obstacle between that sort of a conspiracy and its consummation by permitting the defaulting company to interfere with and prevent others from operating trains upon the roads, whatever the necessity?

The statement of a query of that kind is its own answer; and yet the Government has as much right to permit that sort of interference as to permit any other interference that would succeed in paralyzing the functioning of the great system of transportation so necessary to all the people and every section of the country. If the operation of that system is an absolute public necessity, if transportation is a governmental function, and if we can neglect it in one direction whereby it comes to naught, we can neglect it in all directions whereby it comes to naught.

There is a difference between an employee and the owner of a road, of course; there are many differences; there are some fundamental differences; but in the combination of ownership, management, and operation they are all engaged in the performance of a common duty to the public, just as is the general commanding the Army, the department having upon its shoulders the duty of furnishing equipment and supplies, and the soldier who goes into the trench and fights the battle. The private who fails his country in such an exigency is shot; so is the officer, and so is the commander. It is because they are all engaged in the highest of all duties, that of fighting the battles of their country. This is analogous; and no organization of capital or of individuals can be exempt from the authority of the Government and disregard its needs with impunity without bringing that Government into humiliation and failure.

Mr. President, I think that the provisions of the bill to which the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is aimed must have been framed in strict accordance with the decision of Mr. Justice Harlan in the Arthur-Oakes case. That case has been cited by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] as an authority in opposition to these features of the propsed law. It has also been cited as stating the law upon the subject; and in that I agree, although I have no doubt there are many other decisions equally valuable, some of which may perhaps differentiate from this. In this case the trial judge, at the instance of the receiver, issued an injunction which restrained the employees of the company from doing certain things, which I need not read.

Among the things which they were restrained from doing was—

> From combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad, and from so quitting the service of the said receivers, with or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad.

Afterwards a second writ of injunction was issued, which not only repeated the substance of the prohibition which I have just read, but also prohibited the employees—> from ordering, recommending, approving, or advising others to quit the service of the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. on January 1, 1894, or at any other time.

The appellants were the chief executive officers of the Brotherhoods of Locomotive Engineers, Railway Conductors, Firemen, Telegraphers, Railway Trainmen, and the Switchmen's Mutual Aid Association. They did not seek to avoid the injunction, but only to modify it by striking from both writs the words which I have read. The motion was in writing, and the court granted it by modifying the second writ of injunction. Then an appeal was taken to the court of appeals, and a decision was rendered by Mr. Justice Harlan granting the motion.

Mr. KIRBY. What is the volume?

Mr. THOMAS. Volume 63, Federal Reporter, the case being entitled "Arthur against Oakes." The Senator will find the case beginning on page 310.

I share fully the eulogy pronounced by the Senator from Kentucky upon this distinguished justice, than whom no abler, wiser, nor more patriotic man ever sat upon the Supreme Bench of this or any other country. I read one or two extracts from his decision not heretofore presented:

> It will be observed that the motion of the interveners does not question the power of the court to restrain acts upon the part of the employees or others which would have directly interfered with the receivers' possession of the trust property, or obstructed their control and management of it, as well as attempts, by force, intimidation, or threats, or otherwise, to molest or interfere with persons who remained in the service of the receivers or with others who were willing to take the places of those withdrawing from such service.

Whatever the reason may have been, the defendants acquiesced in that part of the writ of injunction.

> But it was contended that the circuit court exceeded its powers when it enjoined the employees of the receivers "from combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad, and from so quitting the service of said receivers, with or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad."

Then the court continues:

> If an employee quits without cause and in violation of an express contract to serve for a stated time, then his quitting would not be of right, and he would be liable for any damages resulting from a breach of his agreement, and perhaps, in some states of case, to criminal prosecution for loss of life or limb by passengers or others, directly resulting from his abandoning his post at a time when care and watchfulness were required upon his part in the discharge of a duty he had undertaken to perform.

The court then decides what is called the vital question. That portion of the decision has been read into the RECORD by other Senators. Then the court proceeds:

> The right of an employee engaged to perform personal service to quit that service rests upon the same basis as the right of his employer to discharge him from further personal service. If the quitting in the one case or the discharging in the other is in violation of the contract between the parties, the one injured by the breach has his action for damages; and a court of equity will not, indirectly or negatively, by means of an injunction restraining the violation of the contract, compel the affirmative performance from day to day or the affirmative acceptance of merely personal services.

The court, speaking of the evils which may result from that application of the law, then says:

> But these evils, great as they are, and although arising in many cases from the inconsiderate conduct of employees and employers, both equally indifferent to the general welfare, are to be met and remedied by legislation restraining alike employees and employers so far as necessary adequately to guard the rights of the public as involved in the existence, maintenance, and safe management of public highways.

And that is precisely what the labor sections of the bill propose to do. They are applicable alike to employers and employees. Those who framed the bill evidently accepted the law as laid down by this eminent justice.

He continues:

> In the absence of legislation to the contrary, the right of one in the service of a quasi public corporation to withdraw therefrom at such time as he sees fit, and the right of the managers of such a corporation to discharge an employee from service whenever they see fit, must be deemed so far absolute that no court of equity will compel him, against his will, to remain in such service—

And so forth.

"In the absence of legislation to the contrary!" Now, the committee in framing this bill propose to legislate upon the subject, to prohibit the employee in the one direction and the employer in the other from doing those things which will interfere with and imperil the public welfare.

How such legislation can be unconstitutional, how it can interfere with any absolute, inalienable right, in view of what the law is, as declared by one of its greatest interpreters, passes my comprehension. It says to the owner of the road: "You shall not arbitrarily discharge your employees. You shall not refuse to operate your road. You must continue the performance of this public duty which has been delegated to you by the Government at your request." It says the same thing to the employees. If that is not an effort to dispense equal and exact justice to every element entering into this complicated character of service, then I am unable to understand the English language.

Mr. President, I must define a strike by our own experiences concerning them. We may be satisfied with abstract definitions, but we know what strikes are in practice, and it is the practice at which the law must aim, and that practice necessarily, to be successful, involves the exercise of force, positive or negative, or both. Without such exercise, the man who does not want to strike or the man who wants to work would not be interfered with, and if they are not interfered with the strike is apt to be a failure. You might as well talk about a peaceful revolution in Mexico as to talk about a peaceful strike, especially if it possesses any dimensions. And when we consider that there is no resulting damage, no available remedy to the injured party which he can assert and enforce successfully in a court of justice against those thus acting, the need of restraint would appear to me the more absolutely essential.

No labor organization of which I have any knowledge is incorporated. The associations are voluntary. What they do, therefore, they do without those attending responsibilities which the law imposes upon organized effort, incorporated effort, or by individuals who can respond in damages. It is true the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Danbury Hat case, enforced a judgment obtained by the hat company against a certain body of men who struck, and who sought, and sought successfully in some degree, to prevent the continued operation of the factory against which the strike was directed; but every judge connected with that decision has been the subject of the severest personal criticism and in some instances of personal abuse by the organizations as a violation of their inalienable rights and as inflicting upon them great, cruel, and unjust burdens. Generally speaking, men are so certain that recovery is impossible that they take their losses and say nothing about it.

Away back in 1886 Congress passed a law regarding national trade-unions. That law now constitutes sections 8908 to 8912, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It extended to trade-unions the right and privilege of incorporating, and, of course, the right carried with it certain responsibilities. The law has been a dead letter. Organizations have not sought to take advantage of it, because they could then be held, like other people, responsible for violations of the law and for the infliction of injury upon others. They prefer immunity from the consequences of wrongdoing.

Suppose, Mr. President, that some operator should bring suit to-morrow against that particular union in his immediate vicinity, belonging to the United Mine Workers of America, for the loss and damage inflicted upon him in consequence of this strike: How far would he get with it? Where would he find a jury possessed of a sufficient sense of independence, freedom, and exemption from the influence of the great body of the organization to respond in damages? Take the strike against the steel company or companies. I am not just now interested in the justice or injustice of that strike, but I do know that some property was destroyed by those engaged in that movement. How long would a suit in the city of Youngstown or Pittsburgh last if brought against Mr. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Foster, or the organizations which they represent, for damages? Possibly a judgment might be obtained; unquestionably the law should give it, upon the general principle that there should be no wrong without a remedy; but no such remedy exists except in the abstract, and the man resorting to it will generally have his expenses for his pains.

The Adamson law was enacted upon the eve of a Nation-wide strike of railroad trainmen of all kinds. Suppose it had been put into operation: It would have tied up the country, with the resulting great loss to individuals, companies, and sections of the community. But where was any redress? If the railroad companies determine to suspend operations until their ideas of a tariff rate shall be accepted by the public, a remedy exists. Suits may be brought against them and their property may be taken under execution to satisfy any judgment obtained; but not so with the organization. Hence, if I am right—and I think I am—there is all the more need for preventive legislation, if such legislation can be enacted and afterwards enforced.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] says that the brotherhoods are composed of our best American citizenship, and that is true. He says they represent virtually the aristocracy of labor, although I do not know that he used that identical expression; but that is true. He says they are made up of law-abiding citizens, and that I cheerfully accept. Therefore, he says, there is no need for legislation of this kind. But, Mr. President, I do not think that follows at all. Men do collectively, and particularly where there is no corresponding liability, many things that they would not do individually. We do know that the men belonging to these brotherhoods were ordered out in 1916. We do know that some threats were made about the time the last demand for a raise was being considered. Justice requires the statement that they were explained and corrected by the leaders shortly afterwards, but they were made. We know that certain local strikes took place, notwithstanding the action of the leaders, notably at Los Angeles and afterwards at Kansas City. We know that according to the latest estimates the coal strike inflicted a loss upon the country of $260,000,000, and that is wiped out. I might retort and say that if none of these bodies expect to quit work, then this law will not hurt them; it will be perfectly innocuous. But there are other organizations besides those mentioned which have to do with transportation, whose establishment is of recent date, and whose actions up to this time we do not know much about. My experience is that the tendency to strike, and to strike, and to strike is a tendency that is growing progressively in this country.

I have here a statement, to which I will refer for a moment, bearing upon that proposition.

The total number of labor strikers between the date of our declaration of war and the date of the armistice in this country was 2,386,285. Now, when we consider that the total number of men sent to France was 2,053,347, it follows that the army of strikers during that period exceeded the army of fighters during that period by about 350,000 men; and that was a time, Mr. President, when the energy and the labor of every citizen was sadly and sorely needed, when every impulse of duty and patriotism combined to keep the home fires burning, that the boys across the sea might need nothing essential to their supreme and heroic task, notwithstanding which these are the appalling figures.

I am not now discussing the justice or the injustice, the wisdom or the unwisdom, of these strikes. I know many of them were called to force the Government to pay higher wages, and some of them were doubtless due to the need of improved conditions. Since the war we have had a perfect carnival of strikes in this country, some of them of huge dimensions, nearly all of them attended to a greater or less degree by violence and the destruction of property, and every one of them menacing, more or less seriously, every American citizen desiring to continue to work or to take the place of some of these men. Some time ago I received a letter from an ex-member of the American Expeditionary Forces in San Francisco. He said the men who struck in the shipyards had gone to work in other avenues of industry, while he and others who wanted work were not permitted to take their places because they did not receive the protection which the Government of the United States should give them, and without which their lives would be in jeopardy the moment they attempted it.

Mr. President, when face to face with these conditions and confronted by the duty of seeing to it that such legislation as we enact must be effective and keep the roads going, I am unable to vote for the motion to strike out these provisions, and particularly since the Senator making it has nothing better to offer. The Senator asked me a few moments ago if a spontaneous strike of men was a right with which we could interfere. I responded by asking him if he ever heard of such a strike. He said he had occasionally; but admits that without the element of potential strength or force behind them they must prove a disappointment, a failure.

Upon this subject, Mr. President, I quote an author who was a member of a trades-union himself, whom the labor elements of the United States justly regard as a patron saint, and who had one of the keenest and most analytical minds of any man of his generation. I refer to Henry George, the author of Progress and Poverty. He had occasion, when running for mayor of New York, to indite a letter to Pope Leo XIII. What inspired the letter I do not know, but trades-unionism was its subject, and this is what he said:

While within narrow lines trades-unionism promotes the idea of the mutuality of interests, and often helps to raise courage and further political education, and while it has enabled limited bodies of workingmen to improve somewhat their condition, and gain, as it were, breathing space, yet it takes no note of the general causes that determine the conditions of labor, and strikes for the elevation of only a small part of the great body by means that can not help the rest.

Aiming at the restriction of competition—the limitation of the right to labor—its methods are like those of the Army, which even in a righteous cause are subversive of liberty and liable to abuse, while its weapon, the strike, is destructive in its nature, both to combatants and noncombatants.

To apply the principle of trades-unions to all industry, as some dream of doing, would be to enthrall men in a caste system. Union methods are superficial in proposing forcibly to restrain overwork while utterly ignoring its cause and the sting of poverty that forces human beings to it.

And the methods by which these restraints must be enforced multiply officials, interfere with personal liberty, tend to corruption, and are liable to abuse.

Labor associations can do nothing to raise wages but by force. It may be force applied passively, or force applied actively, or force held in reserve, but it must be force. They must coerce or hold the power to coerce employers; they must coerce those among their own members disposed to straggle; they must do their best to get into their hands the whole field of labor they seek to occupy, and to force other workingmen either to join them or to starve.

Those who tell you of trade-unions bent on raising wages by moral suasion alone are like people who tell you of tigers that live on oranges.

Labor associations of the nature of trade guilds or unions are necessarily selfish; by the law of their being they must fight, regardless of who is hurt; they ignore and must ignore the teaching of Christ, that we should do unto others as we would have them do to us, which a true political economy shows is the only way to full emancipation of the masses.

I wish that thought could be driven into the hearts and minds of every man and woman in this country. He continues:

They must do their best to starve workingmen who do not join them; they must by all means in their power force back the "scab," as a soldier in battle must shoot down his mother's son if in the opposing ranks—a fellow creature seeking work, a fellow creature, in all probability, more pressed and starved than those who bitterly denounce him and often with the hungry, pleading faces of wife and child behind him. And in so far as they succeed, what is it that trades guilds and unions do but to impose more restriction on natural rights; to create "trusts" in labor to add to privileged classes other somewhat privileged classes; to press the weaker to the wall?

I speak without prejudice against trades-unions, of which for years I was an active member. I state the simple, undeniable truth when I say their principle is selfish and incapable of large and permanent benefits, and their methods violate natural rights and work hardship and injustice. Intelligent trades-unionists know it and the less intelligent vaguely feel it.

Mr. President, if I had uttered those sentiments, I would be characterized as an enemy of organized labor, which I am not. But we must recognize that it is based upon a selfish principle, just as an organization of vested interests is based upon a selfish principle, and should therefore be subject to the same controlling legal influences. Organizations of men and organizations of property differ but little in these days in their ultimate purpose. I have spent a great part of my life in fighting the one. I can not accept the practices of which they are guilty because they have been adopted by other sources for different reasons. We do know that unionism does tend to exclusiveness, and the extent to which that exclusiveness may go in the long run no man can tell.

I have a clipping here which does not relate to an entirely isolated case, which, nevertheless, vividly illustrates, as Mr. George says, the exclusive and selfish and forcible character of the general movement.

Mr. Foster expressed Mr. George's idea regarding the scab more forcibly and perhaps more logically when he said that a man might rob, he might steal, he might violate all of the laws of the country, and be pardoned; but if he went to work during a strike to earn an honest living he should be exterminated like vermin. It is true that when asked what he meant by that statement he said he meant to educate him; a conclusion which men may or may not accept.

I read a clipping from the Literary Digest, and typewritten, by the way, because a number of pressmen's organizations in New York, in violation of their contracts, did not strike, but went off on "a long vacation." This clipping reads:

MR. MURPHY, THE UNION, AND HIS PORCH.

"May I not paint my own porch?" asked a Chicago citizen named Murphy a few days ago. "You may not," promptly replied the painters' union of the Windy City, and forthwith proceeded to levy a fine of $50 on Murphy as a penalty for such painting as he already had done. Being true to the type indicated by his name, Murphy refused to pay the fine, and, according to the Chicago Tribune, "upon his refusal to pay this criminal demand he was slugged." The Tribune's attention was first called to the episode by the receipt of a letter from Murphy's daughter, in which the circumstances were related. After publishing the letter in the department of the paper known as the "Voice of the people," the Tribune received a number of other letters from persons who expressed themselves in regard to the incident. These were also published in the "Voice of the people." We reproduce three of them herewith. The first, after registering its writer's objection to the interference of the union, relates another instance of such interference. The letter says:

"It seems we can neither paint our own porches nor mend our own plumbing without being threatened with violence, and in many instances receiving it from the trade-unions with whom the officials do not care to stir up trouble when violence has been done to individuals. Who is this czar that can infringe upon our most sacred right, personal liberty, and regulate our affairs in our own home?

"Yesterday a janitor stopped a woman's maid who was washing the windows of her apartment, as he said that was the union window washers' work, who came around once a week and charged 20 cents a window. There are 15 windows in her apartment. She was timid and complied with his demand."

The second letter is written by a man who defends the action of the union in these quite outspoken words:

"In the Voice of the People you begin to talk up Murphy as if he was a martir the same as some other cases you butted in this town of Chicago to a union town and after union agents have raised wages up where they are who told you to but in and take a side with scabs that go to painting their own jobs instead of giving out the job to regular union men. Let any man mind his own jobs in his own trade and not try to hoggit all. The common people aint going to stand much longer for one man holding out against organized labor in defying its rules. All wealth is labor and nothing else when Murphy painted his own job he stole the laboring mans wealth. You say has a man got a right to paint his own house and the union says no and means it. Murphy didnt have no right to lay a brush on that job and if he did go to buy that shack he didnt have no right.

"Yours for unionism honest pay freedom Americanism 6 hours day and liberty."

Mr. President, I knew of two such occasions in the town of Goldfield, Nev., away back in 1906, when the I. W. W. was in its infancy. Nobody defends these things openly, except such gentlemen as wrote to the "Voice of the People." But in practice, Mr. President, the progress has been constantly toward that identical end, and because legislators are timid about enacting laws for the protection of the individual, and because courts and juries are timid about enforcing the laws which we have, the point has been reached where it is declared that no laws can be passed upon this subject because striking is an inalienable right, and men high in authority announce in advance of their enactment that if they are placed upon the statute books they will be openly defied and flouted. If that is the situation, if we have reached that point, then it is only a question of days, Mr. President, when the nongovernmental organizations will possess the political and temporal power of the country, when they might just as well take possession of the Government and operate it in the exclusive interest of a part only of the great body politic. But if, on the other hand, the institutions of the country are to be protected, the Government is to perform its duty to the people whose servant it is, and the avenues of transportation are to be kept open and continued, it behooves us to assert what little power we have left and make an effort at least to perform our duties to the people who sent us here.

In considering a question of this kind we must not forget the extreme need, as I have heretofore emphasized, of the 110,000,000 people. Since the steel strike I have received many letters from farmers, not only in my own State but many others, asking why the Congress did not meet the difficulty, protesting against the extreme to which certain elements of organized labor were proceeding, and realizing that they were as much concerned, perhaps more concerned, as to results as any other class of the people, for there must be an eternal conflict between the producer and the consumer when a portion of the latter insist upon high compensation and a low price of living. The two are absolutely irreconcilable.

It is supposed, and for years it was a fact, that there was no such thing as a right without accompanying responsibility. The privilege which a man enjoyed was accompanied by corresponding duty, which limited it and was inseparable from it. He who claimed the exercise of any right was very properly required to recognize the limitations of the responsibility. I have a right under the rules to speak in the Senate all the time——

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator exercises it.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Arizona says I exercise it. That may be true, but every other Senator, including the Senator from Arizona, has the same right. If it be true that I have exercised it, then I have trespassed upon the rights of the Senator from Arizona and upon the rights of every other Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator, when he exercises that right, is always exercising it for the good of the country and the delight and interest of the people and his colleagues.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator for the compliment, but I am merely illustrating in a homely way what should be an obvious fact. That right is not unlimited in its actual operation, for otherwise it would destroy the prerogatives of the other 95 Members of the Senate.

I have a right to use the streets, even with an automobile if I were rich enough to possess one, but I have no right to use it so as to interfere with the rights of my neighbor. He is frequently run over, and the man who runs over him recklessly and deliberately should be shot on sight; but he is exercising the same kind of a right when he does it that many exercise who are to-day clamoring for rights and at the same time evading or ignoring their responsibilities.

These provisions of law are merely designed, however inoperative they may be, to regulate rights limited by responsibility and obligation.

Moreover, Mr. President, under the requirements of the situation, and I pass now briefly to another part of the bill, we are required to return the roads in practically as good condition as when we got them.

The Senator from Alabama called attention to the fact that in the item of wages alone we have increased the expense of transportation since Government possession by a billion dollars and when the roads go back that added burden goes with them. No man is insane enough at present to think about a reduction of wages and particularly a reduction of the wages of the men who are employed in railroad operation. I am not attacking these rates, for frankly the impression that the railroad employees of the country were the best paid of our employees before the war is a mistaken one. I have here an extract from an official statement issued by Mr. McAdoo on that subject when he was at the head of the Railroad Administration, and I ask leave, without reading, to incorporate it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objections, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Report bipartisan commission appointed by Secretary McAdoo January 18, 1918, Secretary Lane, chairman:

"It has been a somewhat popular impression that railroad employees were among the most highly paid workers. But figures gathered from the railroads disposed of this belief. Fifty-one per cent of all employees during December, 1917, received $75 per month or less. Even among the locomotive engineers, commonly spoken of as highly paid, a preponderating number receive less than $170 per month, and this compensation they have attained by the most compact and complete organization handled with a full appreciation of all strategic values. Between the grades receiving $150 to $250 per month there is included less than 3 per cent of all the employees (excluding officials), and these aggregate less than 60,000 men out of a grand total of 2,000,000. The greatest number of employees on all the roads fall into the class receiving $60 and $65 per month—181,693; while within the range of the next $10 in monthly salary there is a total of 312,761 persons. In December, 1917, there were 111,477 clerks receiving annual pay of $900 or less. In 1917 the average pay of this class was but $56.77 per month. There were 270,855 section men whose average pay was $58.25 per month; 130,075 station service employees whose average pay was $58.57 per month; 75,225 road freight brakemen and flagmen whose average pay was $100.17 per month; and 16,465 road passenger brakemen and flagmen whose average pay was $91.10 per month."

Mr. THOMAS. The statement shows that the average wage paid before the Government assumed charge of the railways was very much below the cost of living, very much below. The men were obliged, in view of existing conditions, to ask for, and it was but just that they should have received, the increase. The difficulty, however, with the increase is that it was not properly distributed. Some men are paid inordinate wages and others are not paid wages enough. I do not know what the system was; in fact, I do not think there was any system. It seemed to be a haphazard condition based largely upon classifications of employment. Here is one of the instances of the unwise and improvident distribution of wages:

A Wabash Railroad water tank, operated by electricity, is tended by a farmer, who turns on the switch in the morning, works all day at his own business, and turns the switch off at night. For this he was formerly paid $20 a month. Under the Government Railroad Administration he was classed as an electrician, his time was figured for the entire day, and he was allowed $300 a month and given over $2,500 back pay.

I have no doubt this gentleman is very anxious to continue the roads in the possession of the Government and that there are many others who have similarly been discriminated in favor of who naturally feel that way.

But, Mr. President, we are running behind in the operation of our roads to the extent of millions upon millions of dollars every year. We have been told that in addition to the liabilities of the railroad companies to the Government, and for which they must have time for settlement, there is a deficit of some $600,000,000 to $650,000,000. That is for two years. If we keep the roads two years longer the chances are ten to one that the deficiency will progressively increase, because there will be other demands for advances in wages, and so forth, and with each of these demands, production being a diminishing quantity, there will be a corresponding increase in the deficiency.

Is it to the interest of the millions of taxpaying Americans to continue the possession of the roads under such conditions any longer than is absolutely necessary? The man who pays the taxes is entitled to a little occasional consideration in Congress, although we express that consideration generally in appropriation bills. He is the man upon whom the burden of this stupendous financial responsibility directly rests.

I repeat what I have frequently said here, that we can not go on forever in our reckless management of financial affairs, rich as we are, as we are going on now. The $650,000,000 must be paid. If we keep the roads two years longer it will be $1,500,000,000 which must be paid. How shall we pay it? There is only one way, and that is to take the taxpayer and turn him bottom side up and run the money out of his pocket into the National Treasury. I wish he would organize and assert some of his rights occasionally.

We shall spend between $5,000,000,000 and $6,000,000,000 of his money during the next fiscal year. If we add to it practically half a billion dollars as another deficiency, supplement that with the demand for $750,000,000 for soldiers' bonuses, and that with the demand for $500,000,000 for good roads, I actually think that even the American taxpayer will begin to show some signs of rebellion.

Under the circumstances I want to get rid of the railroads and give them back to their owners as soon as possible, and save that drain. I want the guaranty, which under our arrangement we must give, to be limited to the lowest proportion consistent with the efficiency which we require of these concerns. I want to see production and thrift reestablished as old American virtues, for until they are reestablished we will fight the high cost of living and all our other troubles in vain.

I think this is a good step. I once thought, and thought seriously, that inasmuch as the Interstate Commerce Commission was far from successful, inasmuch as the regulation of the railway companies, try as hard as we might, was accompanied by many discriminations and many abuses, Government ownership was our last resort, and we ought to assume it as soon as possible. But if the two years of public administration is a sample of Government ownership, then may God in His infinite mercy deliver the people of the United States from its longer continuation.

The other is not a satisfactory alternative. The bill seeks, however, and I think successfully, to modify these conditions and eliminate a great many of the evils of which the people justly complain.

Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that it seems to me that those who will not accept and propose to vote against this bill, owe it to us, to the railroads, and to the country to propose a better scheme and one which will accomplish the main object with less expense and with more satisfaction to all concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think we are considering a practical proposition. I do not see any particular reason to get red-headed about it one way or the other. I do not see any particular reason to become Bolshevists in connection with it or to become reactionaries, either one. The world up to this date has pursued its even course, and the world, outside of immediate war conditions, has conquered a higher place every century and every generation. Labor has conquered a higher place every century and every generation by means of cooperation amongst laborers to advance their welfare. I do not see any reason why I should rise in rebellion against labor unions or against agreements amongst laborers to make their place in the world better than that place has been or now is.

Mr. President, we have just passed through a state of universal war in which men were killed and dismembered, women were starved and ravished, and children were deprived of milk at the time that they ought to have had it—a period during which the birth rate immensely decreased and the death rate increased still more immensely. I stand here as one of those men who want peace—international peace, industrial peace, every form possible of peace between man and man, with the love of God and of God's dear Son extended in an apostolic blessing upon us as we seek peace.

I am opposed to every form of contention and war, international or industrial. I am in favor of every sort of arbitration, every sort of impartial tribunal that may diminish the chances of war and increase the chances of peace.

Mr. President, I left my home this morning and came down to the Capitol in the street car. I saw the streets splendidly paved, automobiles passing by, high buildings in which were housed the men who are carrying on private industries in the city of Washington, and the great public buildings and the monuments along the way. I saw beautiful women coming into the car and going out of it; I saw strong, stalwart men coming in and going out. I said to myself: "This is a picture of the accumulation of the human race in mutual benefit and in happiness which we call civilization."

Up to this good date in the history of the world, Mr. President, that civilization, at odd and irregular intervals, has been subject to annihilation. Barbarians came around the Caspian Sea with knives in their teeth and bridle reins in their hands.

All that Plato taught in Greece went for naught; all that Seneca taught in Rome went for naught. The barbarians conquered. While Rome went on, the world went into a state of demilunaticism for something like a thousand years.

The great Macaulay said that the only difference was that while the old race of barbarians came from the forests of Germany and from the steppes of Asia the new race of barbarians would come from the alleys of the great cities and the back sloughs of the great factories. Now, is that true or not? Have we got to meet with it or have we not? It depends upon your wisdom, upon my wisdom, and the wisdom and vision of everybody else. And, Mr. President, what does that depend upon?

Does the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who has just taken his seat, imagine that the only danger to world civilization to-day is Bolshevism; that the only danger is trade-unionism—a much less thing—or does he not imagine that, perhaps, a part of the danger is due to the very reaction which he has expressed; the very counter-revolution which he represents? In medio tutissimus ibis—in the middle of the way lies safety—is a wise rule for all people at all times.

Oh, Mr. President, if I just could divorce Representatives and Senators in Congress from their idea of being reelected to something, if I could just divorce their minds from senatorial or congressional or presidential aspirations, and lead them to think honestly with one another as if they were around a social board, with no especial object in mind, I could accomplish the purpose which I, at any rate, have in view.

Mr. President, what is this matter that we are discussing? I want to bring the ship back to where we can take our bearings. So much has been said about it, and so much has been said so foolishly, that it is well for us to know just what we are doing. This is the provision under discussion:

SEC. 30. It shall be unlawful for two or more persons, being officers, directors, managers, agents, attorneys, or employees of any carrier or carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, for the purpose of maintaining, adjusting, or settling any dispute, demand, or controversy which, under the provisions of this act, can be submitted for decision to the committee of wages and working conditions—

Which is an arbitral committee established in the cause of peace, established for the purpose of preventing industrial warfare—or to a regional board of adjustment—

A subordinate board of the same sort—or to a regional board of adjustment, to enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation.

Now, mark you that—"the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation."

Mr. President, I find two sides here contending for a couple of theories, one with the view that a man has a right to combine with everybody in the world, no matter with what result to the general public, in order to stop or to hinder "the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation," the other side contending that nobody has any right to quit work—both of them equally foolish, both of them equally absurd. All that this bill says is that the employees shall submit to this chief board and to this subboard of arbitration the questions in dispute—before what? Before they "hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation."

Mr. President, this Republic contains something like 110,000,000 men, women, and children. The great city of New York, perhaps now, with its suburbs in New Jersey and on Long Island, the largest city in the world, except it may be London, contains something like five or six million people. Probably something more than one-half of that population are women and children, and one-tenth of that population are children, little babies seeking the milk bottle or their mother's breast—and under the new order of modern women, under the new civilization, they seek their mother's breasts almost in vain, and must have milk bottles. If a man comes to me and tells me that upon some theory or other he has a right to stop the transportation of milk to those babies in New York, I tell him when he says it that he is a self-confessed murderer of children. He is worse than King Herod, because King Herod did try to find out the children who were born in Nazareth, whereas these other men are not trying to find out anything about the children at all except to starve them. They care not for their parentage or birth place.

Chicago contains almost as many people as New York; Philadelphia somewhat less; Boston still less; but there is not a great city in the United States that could do without railroad transportation of milk for three weeks without starving not hundreds but thousands of babies.

Talk to me about the schemes of the Kaiser and of German barbarism! This is industrial barbarism worse yet. Talk to me about the iniquity of the Senate in defeating the league of nations! That was bad enough, but this is infinitely worse. They were both contemptible, but this is still more contemptible than the others were.

The human being whose soul can not rise, not to the point of harmony with Jesus Christ, because none of us can do that, but to the point of sympathy with His goal and His dreams and His visions, is a human soul unworthy to sit here and talk about industrial peace or industrial war or international peace or international war.

But that is all this provision means, that before they can go out on what they call a strike—which is not an individual man quitting work, but is a combination amongst various men; a strike confined to the "operation of trains or other facilities of commerce"—they must first go before one of these two boards.

Does a man tell me because he labors with his hands and I do not labor with mine, that therefore he has a right to starve babies and I have not a right to starve them?

Why should his hand thrust be any more innocent than my brain thrust? Perhaps he ought to be in my place, exercising his brain, and I ought to be in his place, exercising my hand. That is more than probably true, because, judging by the failure I have made here, he could have done better in my place, although I doubt whether I could have done better in his place.

How does this read?

With the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or in pursuance of any such combination or agreement and with like purpose substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce; and, upon conviction, any such person shall be punished by a fine not exceeding—

What? $500—the price of 500 dozen eggs at present.

Or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

Good reason, bad reason, or any reason, or no reason. The thirteenth amendment takes care of that. Congress could not interfere with it if it wanted to.

Now, let us go a little bit further.

SEC. 31. Whoever knowingly and with like intent shall aid, abet, counsel, command, induce, or procure the commission or performance—

Aid, abet, counsel, command; that is the chief word in it—induce, or procure the commission or performance of any act made unlawful in the last preceding section hereof shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, what does it all mean? What does it all mean? It means merely that I have no right to connive with you and conspire with you or with the Senator from Utah to cut off the coal that heats the bodies of the people of America, and to cut off the milk that feeds the babies of America in the large cities, to cut off the farmers' market in the cities and the consumers' purchase of the farmers' products, without first—now, mind you, it does not say that I shall not have a right to do it, but that I shall not have the right to do it without "first leaving it to fair arbitration."

The Senator from Iowa and I have a quarrel. In my opinion the anger is unextinguishable. In his it is equally so; but your laws force him and me to go to court. I can not go out and kill him because he is outraging my utmost sensibilities, nor can he kill me for the same reason. Mr. President, above all things in the world the world must come to this. Internationally, industrially, and in every other way we must come to the idea that industrial and international quarrels, like private quarrels, must be submitted to an arbitration of some sort or to a court.

Even after the Senator from Iowa and I have submitted our quarrel to a court, if outside of the court and afterwards he makes himself so personally disagreeable or dangerous to me, I may kill him, and I may be cleared by the verdict of a petit jury; but I must at least have done all that was to be done in order to comply with the dictates of the world's civilization.

Now, what is the world's civilization? Merely the accumulation of the knowledge of the past generations bunched together in this generation—schools, universities, colleges, churches, pavements, buildings, private character, public laws, international treaties, all the balance of it; the accumulations of men standing upon the shoulders of other men, looking farther than their forefathers could look, simply because they have the opportunity to stand upon shoulders. It is an old saying that a dwarf on a giant's shoulders can see farther than the giant can see.

Mr. President, I do not agree a little bit with a good deal that the Senator from Colorado has said. I have nothing against labor unions, and I do not think labor unions are threatening the civilization of this world at this time. I think certain commotions within labor unions, trying to take possession of the labor unions, are threatening that civilization; but American labor unions are taking care of that internal commotion themselves. Men have a right to combine for the purpose of advancing their wages and shortening their hours and generally ameliorating their condition and the condition of their families, and if they had not had that right this world would have been in barbarism to-day. It was the trade-unions of Great Britain, of the Anglo-Saxon parent stock, operating along the old lines of English-speaking liberty and civilization, that worked out a possible condition for labor; and those unions are going to work out a better condition from day to day and from decade to decade and from century to century. But it will not do to denounce labor unions on this floor—not even though birds of foul nesting have found temporary location there, like this fellow Foster and a few more that in my opinion will be pitched out headlong in less than three months.

Mr. President, I am not afraid of labor unions. There are none of them in Mississippi to amount to anything. I have no political reason to curry favor with them. They count for naught with me, except in so far as they are right, except in so far as they are reaching for a higher level of civilization and of human happiness.

It was Thomas Jefferson who said that the sole purpose of government was the liberty and the happiness of the citizen. I believe that, and I should be ashamed of myself in every fiber of my being if, just because I have nothing to fear politically from some particular element, I was not willing to do that element justice. I am willing to do it justice all the time; but there are limits, Mr. President, and those limits are exactly the limits that you and I must prescribe for ourselves.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] very well said this afternoon that I have the right to use the street and to use it with an automobile, but I must not use it so as to run over you. That is the limit of the labor union's right, and when you come down to spell it out it means this, that capital has a right to combine and to cooperate for higher profits; that labor has a right to combine and to cooperate for better wages, shorter hours, or whatever else they think is good for their members, but that back of both of them stand the other 75,000,000 or 80,000,000 of the American people who are neither capitalists nor labor-union men, and whose voice must be heard; and that voice must be heard and shall be heard in behalf of industrial peace in every industry that deals with the necessities of life or with transportation, which is a necessity of modern industrial life.

No capitalist has the right to close down his works in order that he may make a higher profit after a while while he freezes the American people for lack of fuel. No laborer has the right to go out and shut off the production of coal at the beginning of November, when winter is just beginning, in order that he may have a higher wage or shorter hours.

When that sort of thing occurs, then these 80,000,000 people have something to say; and, as far as I am concerned, and I represent them here—and through my voice, if through nobody else's—they shall be heard; and their voice is, "A plague upon both your houses." Obey the law. "Submit your differences to just arbitrament. Leave me and my wife and my children free of murder at your hands," whether by capitalists closing down the coal mines or by labor closing them down, or whether by capital or labor, either one or both, shutting off transportation. "This thing ye shall not do. By the Eternal God that made the 80,000,000 of us, this thing ye shall not do; and if it be necessary by law, or outside of law, to make you stop it, we will make you stop it. We have the numbers, and we have the power, and we have the money, and we have everything else. Right up to the limit of your rights you shall have free liberty, but beyond that line you shall have nothing. You shall consider the liberty and the happiness of mankind beyond that line. So far as America is concerned, we 80,000,000 constitute mankind here. You shall not starve our babies, you shall not freeze our wives, whether in the name of capital or labor or in the name of any other theory, whether it be Bolshevism at the one extreme or whether it be counter-reaction at the other. That thing of starvation and murder you shall not do. We stand here in our own right, as descendants of the people who settled this country, who made it great, and we are not going to have the accumulation which this generation possesses from all the past generations destroyed, either by the selfishness of capital or by the greed of labor; and when it comes to a transportation question"—and that is all that is involved here—"you must agree that the common carriers can carry freight and can carry on the work of civilization, can carry milk to the babies, can carry fuel to the adult, until at least after you have previously submitted your controversy to a fair and impartial arbitral tribunal." Arbitration must come first.

Is that asking much? Is that asking too much? Is that asking anything of a square man from another square man? Would not the other man, if he was square, grant it beforehand? It would not be even a sacrifice. He would say, "Of course, you are right about that. I am not a brute; I am not a barbarian; I am not a dog, that I should do this thing. I am willing to do what is fair and square, and this is fair and square."

Mr. President, I am a few months over 65 years old now; I have been in public life over a third of a century. If I have had any one great purpose in public life, outside of my determination to be individually honest and fair, it has been to gain peace for the world, internationally, industrially, and in every other way. I have never hesitated to say, with old Thomas Jefferson, that "my passion is peace." International peace is very important. I would give my left arm to accomplish it. Industrial peace is still more important. I would give my right arm to accomplish that. I do not want to make an ass of myself, Mr. President, but I would give my soul to fix some scheme whereby men in their personal and international and industrial relations would submit to reason rather than passion, to reason upon a religious basis of some sort, meaning by that merely a worship of God, a recognition of God's fatherhood and the brotherhood of man, with nothing sectarian about it. I would give my soul, my very soul, to accomplish that purpose. I would go down damned through all eternity, with God's blessing, I hope, to accomplish one-tenth part of that purpose.

Yet, Mr. President, when we meet and discuss things, how do we meet and how do we discuss them? One fellow discusses them as an antilabor-union man, another as a labor-union man, another as a Republican, another as a Democrat, another as a Christian Scientist, another as a Roman Catholic, another as an Irishman, another as a pro-German, another as an American, vaunting his Americanism before everybody else's Americanism; and yet nobody willing just to surrender it all for the sake of the brotherhood of mankind, industrially, internationally, and for peace; not peace at any price, but peace upon a righteous basis, after fair and arbitral adjudication.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 484. An act to provide for the erection of a Federal office building on the site acquired for the Subtreasury in St. Louis, Mo.; and

H. R. 7656. An act to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to Senate concurrent resolution No. 22 directing the Secretary of the Senate to enroll the bill (S. 2472) to amend the Federal reserve act, by making sundry changes in said bill.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 213) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

H. R. 484. An act to provide for the erection of a Federal office building on the site acquired for the Subtreasury in St. Louis, Mo.; and

H. R. 7656. An act to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same.

CABLEGRAM FROM ROUMANIAN CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a cablegram from the Roumanian Chamber of Deputies, expressing the gratitude of the Parliament of Roumania for the support accorded to the Roumanian people by the Congress of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of the Marshall County Kansas Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, remonstrating against the adoption of compulsory military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ELKINS presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 282, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of Moundsville, W. Va., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the suppression of bolshevism and the deportation of undesirable aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a memorial of Mineral King Lodge, No. 129, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Escanaba, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins railroad bill and favoring a two years' extension of Government control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of Adrian College, Michigan, praying for the adoption of the league of nations covenant without reservations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Scottsville, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation granting increased pensions to veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FERNALD. I ask leave to submit a report (No. 336) from the subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, pursuant to Senate resolution 210 of October 11, 1919, on the cost of public buildings and operations of the United States Housing Corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the Farmers National Bank of Wilkinson, Ind., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 338) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2554) for the relief of J. B. Waterman, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 337) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 3564) granting an increase of pension to William S. Wilmoth; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3565) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 3566) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," approved February 5, 1917; to the Committee on Immigration.

A bill (S. 3567) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Fuller; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3568) for the construction of a complete hospital plant in the city of Memphis, Tenn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 3569) granting a pension to Claude H. Johnson; and

A bill (S. 3570) granting an increase of pension to Augustus E. Dodds (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 3571) to establish a national bulletin; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 3572) to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a national highway system, to create a Federal highway commission, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. NEWBERRY:

A bill (S. 3573) to provide for a memorial in commemoration of the death of Joseph W. Guyton, the first member of the United States Army killed on German soil (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 3574) to provide for the sale by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of certain land in the District of Columbia acquired for a school site, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. 3575) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 5, 66th Cong.); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

THE EGYPTIAN QUESTION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a letter which I received from the Secretary of State and which I think it is worth while to have read. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DECEMBER 16, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of November 29 last, in which you inquire as to the effect of this Government's recognition of the so-called protectorate proclaimed by Great Britain over Egypt on December 18, 1914.

In reply I beg to state that the department does not understand that Egypt was, prior to the British proclamation of December 18, 1914, in possession of full independent sovereign rights.

The effect of this Government's qualified recognition of April, 1919, was to acknowledge, with the reservation set forth at that time, only such control of Egyptian affairs as had been set forth in the notice of the British Government transmitted to the department on December 18, 1914, a copy of which is inclosed.

It is assumed that it is the purpose of Great Britain to carry out the assurances given by King George V of England to the late Sultan of Egypt, as published in the London Times of December 21, 1914.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

ROBERT LANSING.

WAR RISK BUREAU PAYMENTS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am just in receipt of a special-delivery letter from a soldier of the American Legion, inclosing a clipping from the evening Washington Times. I desire to take just a moment to read it, and then I want to give a notice. It reads as follows:

HARD SENATE FIGHT FACES SWEET BILL—SMOOT IS DETERMINED TO PREVENT ACTION ON MEASURE BEFORE CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

Supporters of the Sweet bill, increasing the war-risk benefits for disabled service men, will find a lively fight on their hands if they try to get early action in the Senate.

Senator SMOOT, of Utah, who would disintegrate the War Risk Bureau in the interest of economy, stands ready to prevent any contemplated action before the Christmas holidays, despite the optimism of House Members that the Sweet bill is near final enactment.

It is not likely that there will be any action on the Sweet bill or any other war-risk measure in the Senate for a couple of months. Senator SMOOT is waiting for a chance to introduce his bill providing for the disintegration of the War Risk Bureau. Under the measure, he predicts that, with one fell swoop, between 8,000 and 9,000 employees of the War Risk Bureau would find themselves out of jobs.

In the meantime Senator SMOOT intends to hold up action on the Sweet bill or any other measure for the payment of additional compensation to disabled service men. He has made it clear that he does not disapprove liberal treatment of disabled soldiers, and is ready to go far in legislating in their behalf. The trouble lies with the War Risk Bureau, in the opinion of Senator SMOOT, which he believes should be cleaned out from top to bottom.

Mr. President, there is not a word of truth in this article wherein it refers to my position on the Sweet bill. I have on my desk the report on the Sweet bill with amendments agreed to by the Finance Committee, and if the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], having the pending bill in charge, will allow me tomorrow morning to make the report and ask unanimous consent for its consideration, providing it does not lead to unduly prolonged discussion, I am going to make that request.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that I shall reserve for a separate vote in the Senate the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole whereby a new section was added to the bill known as section 44½.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I noticed in several of the daily papers a day or two ago an advertisement signed by a number of gentlemen, and the signers are as follows:

Darwin P. Kingsley, who I understand is president of the New York Life Insurance Co.; Haley Fiske, who is, I understand, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; John J. Pulleyn, president of the Emigrant-Industrial Savings Bank, of New York; George K. Johnson, president of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Philadelphia; L. F. Butler, president of the Travelers Life Insurance Co., of Hartford, Conn.; and L. F. Van Dyke, president of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Milwaukee.

The institutions represented by these gentlemen as their presidents own over one billion dollars railroad securities, upon the stability of which depends the investment securing millions of citizens throughout the country.

There are 46,000,000 life insurance policies outstanding, of which 33,000,000 are unduplicated. These are the regular form of policy. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., of which Mr. Fiske is president, also issues what is termed an industrial policy, of which there are approximately 15,000,000 policies outstanding and held by the working classes generally, including servant girls and young men of the serving class. The holders of this class of policy pay 10 cents a week on their policies.

So life insurance policies are held among all classes, and very largely among the laboring and serving classes of the country.

The Emigrant-Industrial Savings Bank, of which Mr. Pulleyn is president, is the largest savings bank in the country.

These banks, I think, give weight to the statement which follows. I shall not detain the Senate to have the statement in the paper read at this time, but I will ask to have it printed in the RECORD, as I think it is well worth preserving as a part of this debate.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT TO THE PUBLIC.

DECEMBER 17, 1919.

The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce held hearings on the railroad problem practically without intermission from January until October 23, 1919, when a bill (S. 3288) was reported favorably by that committee to the Senate.

Adequate and prompt legislation has been urged by the President. The result of the committee's effort is a bill which is nonpartisan and is responsive to that necessity for remedial legislation which is recognized by the President, by both political parties, and by the American public. This bill is known as the Cummins bill.

The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce also reported a bill dealing with certain features of railroad regulation, which passed the House with sundry amendments. This is known as the Esch bill. It does not deal with certain underlying problems such as definite instructions for rate making, without which private ownership and operation will be imperiled through the old warfare between the managers of the railroads and organizations of shippers, and as the result of distrust on the part of the general public and the unworkable basis of old laws.

Advocates of Government ownership oppose both bills and advocate substantial extensions of the period of Federal control, with that end in view.

DELAY ENDANGERS RESUMPTION OF PRIVATE OPERATION.

The railway properties and the traffic machinery are suffering from the delay in the return of these properties to those responsible directly and solely for the preservation and efficiency of individual systems. We do not suggest that this is the fault of the personnel of the Railroad Administration. It is the unavoidable consequence of consolidated operation by a temporary governmental agency, the first duty of which is to the Public Treasury and which is not and can not be organized from the standpoint of permanent ownership and conservation.

Extension of Federal control longer than necessary to secure the adoption of indispensable remedial legislation would further prejudice and demoralize the established agencies of transportation and make resumption of private operation on a sound basis increasingly difficult. The drive toward Government ownership, which would constitute a blight upon American politics, restrict development, and enormously increase the complexity and friction of Federal Government, can be effectively checked only through prompt and decisive action by Congress.

This action must be through legislation which will put an end to the attitude of suspicion entertained by the public or artificially stimulated toward the American railroads. It must also put an end to the profound apprehension on the part of the railroads and the investing public as to the attitude of the rate-making authorities toward these properties.

Such legislation must prevent the possibility of exploiting security issues and like possible causes of public distrust. It must put an end to the warfare between shipper and railroad management over rates by subjecting rate levels to a workable statutory test and adapting these rates, as suggested by the United States Supreme Court over 40 years ago, "to the circumstances of the different roads," so that necessary units in the competitive system will not be starved to death. This result is to be expected under the old laws, because of the disposition of the rate-making authority to depress the rate levels unduly in order to prevent what would be regarded as an excessive return upon the value of the property of individual roads in the several competitive groups on which unusual density of traffic might otherwise produce excessive results.

BOTH BILLS GREATLY EXTEND REGULATION.

Both Senate and House bills evidence the inflexible purpose to extend the system of Federal regulation of interstate carriers, begun in 1887, to the limit deemed consistent with private enterprise. We do not stop to oppose or commend that purpose. It is fixed and unavoidable, and is responsive to the weight of opinion expressed at the hearings before the two committees. Any bill which passes will undoubtedly control security issues, new construction, car supplies, facilities, and to some extent service and operation.

A business thus regulated must have public confidence and is entitled to reasonable statutory protection. To return these properties without adequate legislation is to destroy them.

If this protection is assured, the investors in railway securities can well afford to relinquish speculative or excessive returns. They are to-day no longer dealing with a speculative possibility, but they must be assured of a fair chance to receive a reasonable return if they produce the energy and efficiency to earn it under rates found to be adequate for the average condition in each group.

The House bill goes to the limit of regulation without any provision remotely tending to recognize the corresponding obligation of Congress for protection from its own elaborate machinery. The Senate bill (S. 3288) as reported contains fair recognition of that obligation in section 6. As new matter is not added in conference under the usual parliamentary procedure, it is plain that the Senate bill should be passed by the Senate and sent to conference with section 6 unimpaired.

PROVISIONS OF SECTION 6 INDISPENSABLE.

Section 6 is fundamental. It is so indispensable in the existing crisis that we trust that Senators and Representatives desirous of a sound system of competitive American transportation may not, upon the floor of the Senate or in conference or upon the question of concurrence, delay or endanger the passage of a bill containing its provisions.

This bill is not in all respects as the Association of Security Owners would desire, but we recognize that legislation is a practical process, the result of the action of many minds, and that this bill is the result of prolonged, patient, courageous, well-informed, and nonpartisan action on the part of the committee which reported it. As such, we trust that it will be substantially accepted by the Senate and sent to conference, where such differences as may arise as to other features of the bill will be reconciled.

The most elementary good faith repudiates the insistence being made in sundry quarters that the Government should consult primarily its own financial interest or should experiment, with a view to ultimate seizure, in respect to a property which it holds in trust for restoration to the owners in as good condition as when received and as soon after the termination of the emergency, ended November 11, 1918, as that can be done with due regard to the integrity of the property.

Section 6 reduces the rate problem to a simple matter of adjustment to maintain the proper relation of rates. This marked simplification is by the use of a statutory measure applied to the aggregate operating incomes of the railroads in each competitive group. The commission is to see that rates produce 5½—plus one-half of 1 per cent, optional with commission—on the aggregate value of all roads in the group, leaving each road in the group free to earn as much as it can under competitive conditions, but limiting the interest of each individual carrier in individual rates to a fair and responsible return upon the value of its property plus a stated proportion of any excess it may earn which is allowed as a stimulation to continued energy and efficiency.

RETURN IS ON PROPERTY VALUE, NOT ON SECURITIES.

The protest against this provision proceeds partly from those who, like the advocates of the Plumb theory, assert that the provision will vitalize watered securities. It has nothing whatever to do with stocks, bonds, or securities. The ratio of return is to be estimated on the value of the property as determined by public authority—the commission. Section 6 of the Cummins bill and the fifth amendment to the Constitution apply the same test—a reasonable return on the value of the property. The only difference is that section 6 defines the rate of return at 5½ per cent on value, with one-half of 1 per cent optional with the commission for unproductive improvements, such as grade crossings, whereas the Constitution left that figure open for legislative or judicial definition. Section 6 supplies the definition.

Other provisions of section 6 regulate excess earnings by requiring a portion of any excess over 6 per cent to be paid into a public fund for expenditure by the board of transportation in the public interest in railway transportation. Protest has been made against this provision as confiscating the earnings of those roads which, by reason of their strategic situation or dense traffic, are able to earn what may be termed excessive or unnecessarily large returns. The application of the provisions of section 6 to the roads which have made that protest discloses nothing to impair their sound future.

The only thing "confiscated" is the opportunity for what may fairly be termed excessive return on the value of the investment.

There is nothing novel or unexpected in applying a statutory limitation upon earnings to enterprises long since subject to rate regulation and now under strict governmental control in all of their functions.

ERRONEOUS STATEMENTS BY THE WALL STREET JOURNAL.

Among the most active spokesmen for those opposing section 6 is the Wall Street Journal, which has repeatedly asserted that the Cummins bill embraces a socialistic scheme for leveling profits of competently managed roads for the benefit of so-called weak roads.

The committees of the Association of Security Owners long since reached the conclusion that a definite rate of return on the aggregate railway investment was more desirable than a chance for speculative returns to a few railroads unlikely to be realized even by them under existing conditions.

It was also recognized that Congress would never concede a reasonably definite assurance unless accompanied by a limitation upon possible excessive earnings. The accuracy of this thought has been doubly demonstrated. The Esch bill provides for no limitation on earnings, and therefore gives no reasonable assurance, no definition, no instruction. The Cummins bill, on the other hand, proposes in section 6 a fairly definite assurance and regulates earnings to a fair return.

Section 6 permits carriers to retain 6 per cent upon the fair value of their property, if they can earn that much from competitive rates established for the group, plus a portion of any excess they may earn. What is discernible in the present outlook to justify hope for greater return? Certainly nothing to justify the wager of the whole transportation system on the chance.

EARNINGS OF ONE ROAD NOT GIVEN TO ANOTHER.

The Cummins bill creates a board of transportation, to which it gives absolute jurisdiction over the general railway fund to be "employed or invested or expended by the board in furtherance of the public interest in transportation by carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce in avoiding congestions, interruptions or hindrances to the railway service," etc.

The primary purpose of the fund, as shown by section 6, is the purchase of equipment or facilities to be used "wherever the public interest may require." While loans to carriers are permitted on terms to be fixed by the board, the fundamental consideration is the public interest, and there is no warrant whatever for the assertion that the Cummins bill provides for revenue to be taken from one road to be given to another.

The public will get the service, and the excess earnings paid into the fund will not be pyramided for the purposes of rate making or "given" to any road or employed on any favored class of roads.

The percentage return fixed by section 6 is not upon stocks or bonds or even upon the value of individual railway property, but upon the actual value of the entire transportation machine in each rate group, as determined by the commission; and the ratio of aggregate return on the value so ascertained is fixed at a figure at which no one can justly complain. Nor can any road attain that ratio of return upon its own value without earning it on a competitive basis. There is neither extortion nor stagnation in that process.

Desirous only of a sound and wholesome future for the railroads, based on deserved public confidence, we desire to emphasize the necessity for prompt and definite legislation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, although I will say a word later in the course of the debate upon the amendments I have offered to the so-called labor sections of this bill, I wish to ask the attention of Senators for a moment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. It would strike from the bill all the machinery of mediation and arbitration which the bill intends to create. It would restore the settlement of differences between the railroads and railroad employees to the status which has heretofore existed.

It is not necessary to consider the whole recent history of employment in the railroad industry, and disputes between the brotherhoods and the railroads, to conclude that it is necessary to take some steps to prevent the recurrence of a situation in which the Government cravenly yielded to the demands of the brotherhoods, and an alarmed Congress, following suit, wrote into law provisions, whatever their merits or demerits, which signalized the surrender of the Government to the demands of a single and special interest in this country.

As I have already indicated to Senators, I do not approve the whole plan contemplated by the bill, for reasons which I shall give very briefly a little later, I hope, in this debate. But in the same sense in which the extreme provision of the bill errs, so does the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky err. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky would leave us liable to a recurrence of the industrial chaos from which happily we are emerging.

I ought to say, in justice to the Senator, that he has weighed with friendly tolerance the views which I, for one, hold. I think I may say that he finds something of merit in them. I have been ready to permit his amendment to go to a decision, unqualified by those which I have in hand, in order that the Senate may make clear its opinion on the policy which his amendment contemplates. The Senate thereafter may act upon the policy contemplated by the amendments which I have offered or which have been offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator if he thinks it would not be well to state substantially the nature of his proposed amendment, and what it is expected to accomplish by it? That might possibly have a bearing on the vote upon the motion to amend now pending.

Mr. McCORMICK. I forbear to do that now because I have already done so, but I will say to the Senator from Florida that the amendments which I offered first fixed the time during which the committee of wages and working conditions or the adjustment board may have a dispute under consideration, in order that those boards might not interminably consider a matter in dispute. It leaves the board and the committee of wages and working conditions precisely as provided in the bill as reported by the committee, but it qualifies the prohibition to strike. It provides that no lockouts or strikes may be called until 60 days after the publication of the decision of the board, as elsewhere provided in the bill. It is the essence of the amendment, that the prohibition to strike is qualified instead of absolute.

Mr. FLETCHER. And after that time either side is at liberty to do as it pleases?

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely; and it is in that sense, and that sense only, that it may be said that the principle of the Canadian act has been adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to address myself briefly to the question of how we may protect the public as far as possible against interference by strikes with the transportation service, which is so indispensable to the prosperity and welfare of all our people.

The bill before us seeks to accomplish this laudable end by mandatory provisions penalizing strikes. Such legislation, in my opinion, will neither accomplish its primary purpose of preventing strikes nor tend to secure that regularity and reliability of service which the public interest requires. My reason for this conviction is that the antistrike provisions of the bill are unfair and unjust, and such legislation rarely, if ever, accomplishes its purposes in a democracy.

I want to impress upon the Senate the wide difference between legislation which attempts to prohibit strikes and legislation which aims to remove as far as possible the incentives to striking. I can not agree that the important question of how to secure an uninterrupted transportation service is squarely and honestly met by the antistrike provisions of the bill. The railroad employees of the country believe, and are justified in believing, that this repressive legislation is aimed against their natural and inalienable rights, and a palpable evasion by the Senate of its duty to thoroughly study and impartially remove the real obstacles in the way of a steady and reliable transportation service. We are not going to promote harmony and efficiency in the service nor do justice to the railroad employees by a law that penalizes strikes but fails to remedy their causes.

Such measures may for the moment gratify the investor whose money is in railroad shares, but it is the right of the great public, of which employees of the capitalist class are but a small part, to have the problem settled on the basis of justice, for only such a settlement can be adequate and secure.

I desire to urge upon the Senate a full inquiry into the real causes of actual and threatened interruptions of service in the public utilities, and of the great loss and injury that these interruptions always cause. This will result not only in a realization that strikes in our transportation service are intolerable, but that they are due to causes that can and must be removed. The end sought will be not only the prevention of organized strikes but the removal of the conditions which create unorganized discontent, lowering the morale and crippling the efficiency of the service long before its ability to function is entirely suspended or destroyed.

Few, if any, will attempt to-day to claim that the right to strike is not and has not been on the whole a useful and beneficial instrument in social progress. The great progress which has been made in America during the last 50 years in improving the conditions of the great working population of our country and, I might add, in benefiting civilization the world over, has been directly or indirectly due to strikes and the right to strike. The enlightened laws that have gradually reduced the hours of labor, improved working and housing conditions, and raised the wages of women and minors have been brought about through pressure brought to bear upon legislative bodies by a public opinion aroused by the disclosures of unjust and oppressive conditions that strikes have revealed.

It is scarcely conceivable that anyone would contend that our present wage standards and the improved working conditions of to-day would have been achieved without the organizations of employees and—regrettable as it is to admit it—without strikes and the right to strike. With this history before us of the hard and long struggle by which these great labor reforms were brought about—our child-labor legislation was agitated for 50 years in some States before it was accomplished—we shall surely hesitate to abolish at one fell swoop the right to strike. There is quite as much reason to say "No more combinations of private capital for increasing profits," because in some instances combined capitalists have broken the fundamental laws of God and man by their unjust treatment of labor, as to say "No more strikes" because some strikes have been unjustifiable.

Strikes among certain classes of employees are, indeed, never justifiable, and among these classes are undeniably our transportation employees. But we can not, merely because we must have uninterrupted transportation, chain these men to their posts as the Romans chained their galley slaves to the oars. The duty of refraining to strike against the public, which in a democracy is rebellion against the Government itself, implies a corresponding obligation upon the public, through its representatives, to provide the employees in the public utilities with the best working conditions and the fairest wages.

The public has a responsibility, which it and we should not shirk, of seeing to it that, whether the railroads remain under public management or are returned to private operation, their employees, who in either case are really the servants of the public, are at least as well if not a little better treated than by private employers requiring the same qualifications and similar kinds of service. We can not very long claim to be a Government or a Nation that sets the highest standards of working conditions and wages and that treats its employees so justly that strikes can not be excused or allowed if we continue to allow our intelligent teachers, our skilled firemen and fearless policemen, the highly trained officers of our Army and Navy, and the high-standard civil-service employees of the Postal Service to be paid less than illiterate foreigners in the steel industry and other occupations under private control.

Is it fair—of course, we have the power—to say even to Government employees, "You shall not strike," unless we prevent their wages from slipping back on account of the rising cost of living until they, who should be the highest paid, are coming to be the lowest paid of all? Can we in justice to the public continue to permit strikes to occur even in the public utilities, which are not operated by the Government, and yet are just as indispensable to the public welfare? How, then, can we in either case say, "No strikes," unless we at least protect them both against the depreciation of the purchasing power of their wages that reduces them below the national standards and deprives them of a living wage?

We should seek, before passing antistrike legislation of the character proposed, to place capital and labor upon an equal footing and lay down the fundamental principle that the public is bound to pay for transportation service a living wage to labor at all times, as well as a just return to capital. Provision is made in the bill for a just return to capital, but no definite provision is made guaranteeing a living wage to labor.

We can not justify legislation which protects capital from the ordinary risks of business and assures to it a steady and liberal return, while at the same time it leaves to labor all the old uncertainty and the risk of failing to obtain even a living wage for its services, which are quite as essential as those of capital, in affording to the public a satisfactory and reliable system of transportation. If the one is to be protected by law, the other should be also.

The main cause of strikes has almost always of late years been the demand for wage increases to meet the increased cost of living. The strike or the threat of striking has been the employee's most effective, if not indeed his only effective, means of forcing his employer to offset by increased pay the increased cost of living which has diminished the purchasing power of his wages. We can not take this weapon from him without supplying a safe and sufficient substitute; and no substitute can be more safe and sufficient than the guaranty of a wage the purchasing power of which shall never be impaired by increases in the cost of living. He has a right to the assurance of a minimum living wage; he has a right to the assurance that in return for taking away from him the right to strike he shall always be given a living wage, a wage which will be so fixed as to fluctuate up and down as the cost of living rises and decreases. This is simple justice, and it is just to the public as well as to the employee, whose relief from anxiety as to the future will be no greater than the relief of the public from the danger and possible disasters of a general railroad strike. Therefore, since the committee bill provides no such guaranty as a compensation for the denial of the right to strike, I intend to vote to strike out the antistrike provision of the bill; and if the Senate by majority vote insists upon the strike provision remaining in the bill, I shall offer an amendment which will provide at least some justification for antistrike legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. I note the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McCormick	Sherman
Ball	Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hale	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Brandegee	Harrison	Moses	Spencer
Capper	Henderson	Myers	Stanley
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Nelson	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Thomas
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Townsend
Edge	Kellogg	Nugent	Trammell
Elkins	Keyes	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Kirby	Poindexter	Warren
France	Knox	Pomerene	Watson
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Ransdell	Williams
Gay	Lenroot	Sheppard	Wolcott

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to indicate that he had an amendment which he desired to offer, if the motion of the Senator from Kentucky should not prevail. I inquire whether the amendment would then be in order, or whether it must not be presented, in order to have consideration, before the motion to strike out is voted on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already ruled that the text is amendable if the motion be defeated. If it is stricken out, of course, it is not amendable. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. STANLEY. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I am paired with him during that absence, and, therefore, must withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote nay.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). On this vote I transfer my general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. NEWBERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have ageneral pair with that Senator. He being absent from the Chamber, I am obliged to withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent on account of official business of the Senate; but, as he would vote on this question as I intend to vote, I feel privileged to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], but on this question I am authorized to vote and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCKELLAR (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have a pair with that Senator. Not knowing how he would vote, I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and allow my vote to stand. As I understand, the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are on the same side of the question, which permits me to make the transfer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am privileged to vote without transfer, so that the Senator is at liberty to make the transfer, if he so desires.

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and let my vote stand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, under a misapprehension I transferred my pair. I understand now from his colleague that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], if present, would have voted as I did. I therefore ask that my vote stand without any record of a transfer.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—25.

So Mr. STANLEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I move to strike out simply the penal sections of this bill—29, 30, and 31—beginning with line 11 on page 70 and going down to line 22 on page 71; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute therefor the amendments which I send to the desk to sections 29, 30, and 31, which are covered by the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not more in order—if that is a proper expression—to perfect the pending sections before a substitute for them is offered?

Mr. MCCORMICK. The Chair has so ruled. That is what this amendment does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood that the Senator from Kentucky had offered an amendment to strike out the penalty and that the Senator from Illinois had offered a more comprehensive amendment as to several sections.

Mr. LENROOT. It strikes out all the sections.

Mr. MCCORMICK. In view of the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, I offered at this moment so much of the printed amendments as covered the sections which the Senator from Kentucky had just moved to strike out—sections 29, 30, and 31.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it seems to me that we are approaching the subject from rather a difficult angle; and I hoped that the motion made by the Senator from Kentucky could be first submitted and voted upon before the proposal of the Senator from Illinois should be presented to the Senate.

I am equally opposed to both the amendment suggested by the Senator from Illinois and the motion or amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. I have already said all that I care to say on the merits of the committee proposal for the adjustment and settlement of industrial disputes. I shall not repeat my argument upon that subject, although there are many Senators here now who were not present when I gave my views with regard to the whole subject. I rise now simply for the purpose of indicating, from my point of view, what the effect of adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be.

The Senator from Kentucky moves to strike out sections 29, 30, and 31. These are the sections which declare the offense. The previous sections relating to the adjustment or settlement of labor disputes would be practically meaningless if they were not followed by the sections which declare the offense; and I am rather assuming that if the Senate desires to take no action whatever upon the subject, it will accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator upon what ground he makes the statement that the other sections will be valueless without the penalty?

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, they will be worse than valueless, from my point of view.

Mr. LENROOT. I had understood the Senator from Iowa to take the position that these so-called penalizing sections would not prohibit the men from quitting their employment, either singly or collectively, but would only penalize a conspiracy to restrain commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing whatever in the sections preceding the penal sections which has anything to do with or puts any restraint whatever upon employees or carriers either. The preceding sections simply create tribunals for the adjustment or decision of disputes between employees and carriers. I am opposed to creating such tribunals if there is no one to give them respect. If we do not legislate in some way that will command respect for these decisions, I should myself move to eliminate them from the bill.

I believe in all kinds of mediation and conciliation. We have those tribunals now in the law, but the tribunals which we have created in this bill are not for mediation; they are not for conciliation; for, as I have just remarked, we have abundant machinery of that kind at the present time. These provisions are for adjudication, and I am not willing that the United States shall, through its tribunals, through officers appointed by the law, adjudicate a dispute between employers and employees unless some respect can be commanded for the adjudication.

If it shall be our policy to attempt mediation and conciliation, well and good. That has its advantages. We have been trying it for years, and we have very excellent tribunals of that sort now, and they are composed of very good men; and there is no necessity of adding anything to these boards or bodies if we intend simply to mediate or conciliate. But I say again that it is the policy of this bill to create Government tribunals, made up, we hope, of impartial, intelligent, patriotic men who will have the authority to decide between the contending or disputing parties; and when the Government of the United States decides a controversy I for one want that decision to command the respect of law-abiding, peace-loving people; and I would not stand personally for these provisions as they are now constituted unless they can be followed by some penalty for disobedience. They are worthless, valueless—worse than worthless and worse than valueless—if some sanction is not attached to them that will lead the people of this country to respect and obey them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, do I gather from the Senator that his construction of the penal provisions is that they compel the employees to accept the decisions of the board and remain at work?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Wisconsin has not drawn the proper conclusion.

Mr. LENROOT. It seems I have not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator believes that he has drawn the proper conclusion, but he has not drawn it. These particular penal provisions of the bill provide that if two or more officers, employees, agents, or attorneys of common carriers enter into a combination or agreement, with the intent or for the purpose of preventing the operation of trains and the movement of commodities in interstate commerce in a substantial way, and for the further purpose of compelling the other side to the dispute to yield or accept the demand so made, whether it is on the part of the employer or on the part of the employee, then that combination or agreement becomes a conspiracy and those who enter into it become subject to the fine of $500 or imprisonment, as the case may be. That is the offense declared in this law; but all of it is preceded with this thought, that the Government has ascertained the justice of the matter and has rendered a decision which every law-abiding man ought to respect.

I do not intend to be misunderstood about it. I am not willing to prohibit in any form whatsoever the strike unless the Government will undertake to determine the justice of the dispute and to award either to the employer or to the employee the justice which either may properly demand. That is the prerequisite for interference with the right to strike or with the combination of which I have spoken.

Now I come to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois has some merit. It has been tried in Canada; not exactly his proposal, because Canada does not adjudicate the merits of the dispute. The Government itself does not become responsible for the adjudication of the dispute in Canada. But there is appointed a tribunal for the purpose of making an investigation, and until the investigation is concluded and a report or recommendation is made regarding the facts the men are prohibited from striking; and this applies to all industries in Canada. It is not limited to railroads. It is a provision which applies to every industrial enterprise and to all workmen.

Now, let us see how difficult it will be to vote discriminatingly upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. If the amendment is adopted—and I understand now that the Senator limits it to the penal provision——

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us see how it would be.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I want to interrupt at this point for the information of the Senator from Iowa. I limit it to those sections which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] more recently moved to strike out. I am minded to raise the point of order against his motion at present; but in any event we go back to sections 25 and ensuing, with the amendment which I originally offered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that would remove some of the difficulties I had in my mind. But I had hoped that we could have a direct vote upon the provisions of the bill as they are and the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. I wish the Senator would withdraw his amendment so that we could have a direct vote on striking out the penal provision of the bill. I think it would add to the clarity at least of the situation.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois offered an amendment to my last motion to strike out the last three provisions. The Chair has hitherto held that it is in the nature of an amendment to perfect the text. If the motion of the Senator should carry, it would apply to other provisions, and a vote on my motion to strike out, in the event it does pass, would be unnecessary, because you would have two penalties provided. I think, of the two amendments, the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois is the least objectionable. For that reason I withdraw the amendment to strike out the last three sections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky did not understand the Chair. The Chair did not say that it was to perfect the text. The Chair inquired whether it was to perfect the text. The Chair does not think it is an amendment to perfect the text at all, but an amendment to strike out and insert. The Chair does not believe that the present motion of the Senator from Kentucky to amend is in order. There was pending before the Senate a question which contained several propositions on which the Senator has a right to have a separate vote of the Senate. He did not ask it, and the Senate voted on them all; and the Chair thinks it is too late now to split them up and take separate votes.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I think the Chair did not catch my motion. I stated that the Chair had previously—not the present occupant of the chair—held that a question of this character is in the nature of an amendment to perfect the text, and that in that event a motion on my motion, after we had voted upon the motion of the Senator from Illinois, would be unnecessary. For that reason, and in the light of that ruling, I wish to withdraw the last amendment offered.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. CUMMINS. All I desire is to clear the way for a vote.

Mr. MCCORMICK. On all the amendments which I have offered?

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is clear now. The Senator from Kentucky has withdrawn his motion to amend.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a word. I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will not prevail. The proposal that the Government shall enter into, not an investigation, but into a judicial inquiry respecting the merits of a dispute between employees and an employer, and shall go forward, taking testimony, hearing arguments, and then adjudging the dispute, adjudicating the merits of the dispute, and that 30 days thereafter it shall be lawful for employees of a railway company to combine and agree amongst themselves, for the purpose of enforcing their demands against their employer, to prevent the movement of trains and the movement of commodities in interstate commerce without incurring some penalty, is to me most extraordinary. If they are to have the right to strike, in view of the assumption by the Government of the task and responsibility of adjudicating the controversy between them and their employer, they ought to have the right from the beginning, and the Government ought not to attempt to impose its will upon either employers or employees.

The Canadian statute, after which the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is fashioned, does not proceed with that want of logic. It does not proceed upon the theory that the Government will adjudicate the merits of the dispute or assume any responsibility for the adjudication of the dispute. The Canadian statute proceeds upon the theory that if all the facts are gathered together by a tribunal competent for that purpose, and the facts are published, then public opinion will correct the evil which may grow from a strike.

Sometimes that is true; sometimes it is not true. I only suggest that there have been more strikes upon the railways in Canada, notwithstanding the statute the substance of which the Senator from Illinois now offers, than there have been in the United States in the same length of time.

In the former hearings, when the committee was surveying the whole field, the representatives of labor were particularly critical of the Canadian statute. Mark you, I do not suggest that the representatives of railway labor are satisfied with the present bill. On the contrary, they oppose it as vigorously and as violently as it is possible for men to oppose anything. But they have represented to the committee many times that the efforts of the Canadian Government to suppress strikes through the investigating committee, and the publication of its reports, had been a total failure; and I rather accept their judgment with respect to that, in view of the instances which they furnish us of the number of strikes which had occurred under the statute.

The proposal of the bill advances one step beyond the Canadian law, beyond possibly any effort that has been made upon this subject, and is founded upon the broad idea that all men will come to believe that if the Government does undertake to adjudicate the disputes and render justice between men and their employers, the wageworker will come finally, if he has not now, to have confidence in his Government. I predict that if the proposal of the bill is enacted into law it will be but few years before its stanchest defenders will be found among the men to whom the Government has administered justice against the injustices, if you please, of their employers.

As I said when I opened this matter to the Senate, it is true that we are taking away from railway wageworkers in some instances the right to strike and suspend in that way the commerce of the country and subject the people of the land to those perils and hardships so graphically described by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. But we are not taking away the right to strike under these circumstances without giving to the wageworkers a right more enduring, more valuable, more likely to produce justice for them than the strike has ever done, and it will not be long, in my judgment, before the whole world, as the Senator from Mississippi has so eloquently said, will see tribunals rise everywhere, created by organized society and maintained by government, for the dispensation of justice not only to wageworkers but to those who represent capital as well.

I do hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will not prevail.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I listened with very much interest to what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said. I am mainly in accord with what he said, but there is a part of his discourse that I think does not bear examination even from his own standpoint.

The tribunal erected is not a Government tribunal. It is not a bureaucratic tribunal. It is not a tribunal representing that part of the American people temporarily in political power at the time of its creation—any political power.

On page 57 of the bill, in section 25, I find this language:

> For the purpose of settling disputes and controversies not adjusted under existing provisions of law or otherwise adjusted between railway carriers subject to this act and their employees, there are hereby created a committee of wages and working conditions and three regional boards of adjustment.
> The committee of wages and working conditions shall be composed of eight members, four of whom shall represent labor and four of whom shall represent railway carriers.

That is not a Government board at all. A Government board would consist of eight members representing the public without any regard to the contestants. This is much less fair than a governmental board because when they finally arrive at their report concerning the controversy that may be before them they have to communicate it to the public. They may agree by majority vote to one report. The employees may agree to one report, the employers may agree to another, and in that event the question will be left to public consideration.

On page 58, line 23, of the bill, I find this provision:

> The committee of wages and working conditions shall have jurisdiction over controversies respecting wages and working conditions of employees upon railway carriers subject to this act. Said committee shall be also empowered to hear and determine cases on appeal from the regional boards where said boards are evenly divided and unable to reach a decision by majority vote.

It is unnecessary to go into any further explanation of that. Farther down, in line 16, on page 59, I find the following:

> If the committee of wages and working conditions is evenly divided upon any question, the matter in dispute, together with all record of proceedings pertaining thereto, shall be referred to the board, whose decisions shall be final.

Mr. President, that all comes down to this: You form a tribunal in which labor and ownership of railways are equally represented. You agree beforehand to abide by their decision. If they make no decision, there is no agreement about a decision which has been made, of course. But if they make a decision, then there is an appeal from that to a higher authority. If that higher authority makes a decision, that must be submitted to. If the higher authority makes no decision, then there is no decision to be submitted to.

My only objection is the lack of teeth in it. I am in favor of the bill as far as it goes, because it is the best thing I can get, but I would have put teeth in it somewhere, where somebody had to submit, somehow, nolens volens, on either side. I have no respect for any board of arbitration that can not enforce its arbitral opinion, no more than I have any respect for a court that can not call in a constable to see that the court's decrees prevail.

This is not a Government board at all, and I was astonished at the Senator from Iowa constantly mentioning it as such.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a Government board, which is appointed regularly, which is paid regularly. It is a permanent tribunal. It is true that its members are drawn from nominations from one class and from another, but when drawn it becomes a permanent tribunal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator from Iowa means is that this is a governmentally appointed board, but it is not a Government board. It does not in any respect represent the Government itself. It represents four members of employees and four members of employers, and they must, under the provisions of the bill, be selected in that way—the employees and employers. If they are honestly selected, and I presume they will be, that will be what they mean. Of course it is, in the sense of being governmentally appointed, a governmentally appointed board. There might be a provision that the President of the United States should appoint a bipartisan board of some description, three members of which should be of one party and three of another, but you could not call it a party board. You would have to call it a nonpartisan or bipartisan board appointed by the Government; nor would it be a governmental board.

This is a governmentally appointed board, but not a Government board, because in no part of it does it represent the Government or the public of the United States. Four members of it represent the operators and owners of the railroads and four members of it represent the employees of the railroads. Some day when we come to consider the matter a little bit further we are going to appoint four more members on that board to represent the public and to sit generally in solemn decision upon the questions between the owners and the employees of the railroads. We seem not to have arrived at that yet.

Those who are quarreling with the proposition are quarreling with it without any cause, because the real cause of the quarrel is that the Government is not represented, that the general public is not represented, and that nobody except the capital and the labor engaged in railroad operation is represented.

If I were going to offer an amendment to this particular provision, it would be that four members should be appointed by the President of the United States, subject to the assent of the Senate, to represent the general public and without any connection with either the ownership or the workingmen's interest in the railroad controversy.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] offers an amendment which seems to me to indicate either a nonapprehension or a misapprehension of the meaning of the law. If I were going to offer an amendment from the standpoint he seems to occupy, but he does not occupy—from the standpoint from which he ought to occupy—I would offer an amendment to have four more members represent the general public, the public of consumers of transported products, who have more interest in the problem than either the men who capitalize the railroads or the men who practically as workingmen operate the railroads.

I find on page 65 another provision, from line 18, inclusive, on page 65, down to and including line 21 on page 66:

> SEC. 30. It shall be unlawful for two or more persons, being officers, directors, managers, agents, attorneys, or employees of any carrier or carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, for the purpose of maintaining, adjusting, or settling any dispute, demand, or controversy which, under the provisions of this act, can be submitted for decision to the committee of wages and working conditions or to a regional board of adjustment, to enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or in pursuance of any such combination or agreement and with like purpose substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce; and, upon conviction, any such person shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.
> SEC. 31. Whoever knowingly and with like intent shall aid, abet, counsel, command, induce, or procure the commission or performance of any act made unlawful in the last preceding section hereof shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that any man fairly and squarely and honestly a good citizen of the United States, whether his interests are capitalistic or operative, ought to be willing to leave any matter in controversy between him and any other citizen to some fair arbitration. There might have been some objection to this if it had been a pure Government board, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] seems to argue, without intending to argue that way. But this is only a bipartisan board, half of it the owners or the capital interested and half of it the operatives or laboring men interested.

My only doubt about the success of the provision is that from my knowledge of human nature I believe that in nine cases out of ten the four representatives of labor will vote one way and the four representatives of capital owning the railroads will vote the other way, and somebody has to bring them into line with one another. There ought to be somebody on the board to do it. There ought to be some ultimate authority on the board to come together. There ought to be somebody somewhere prepared to say, "Confound both your houses. If you want to starve and freeze the public by quarrels amongst yourselves, you must quit it." There must be a board of some sort to settle their controversies, and they must both be made to agree and abide by its decisions, by force if necessary.

The only objection I have to the provision is that it has no teeth—that is, it has not teeth enough, at any rate, to bite—and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] wants to extract the few teeth that it has.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I wish to take a moment to repeat what I have already said, by way of explanation of the substance of these amendments. They fix a time during which the regional boards of adjustment or the committee of wages and working conditions may have matters in dispute under consideration. This time limit was introduced to meet the gravest objection, I believe, which has been raised in Canada against the system in vogue there, namely, that commissions or committees of conciliation have held wage disputes for interminable consideration.

The amendments also provide that parties to the dispute shall resort neither to lockout nor to strike until 60 days after the decision of the board as provided in the act. Here we have taken a ground in principle very different from that taken by the bill. I believe that, going as far as the amendments do, we take a long step in the direction of the settlement of industrial disputes. Indeed, I am happy to have heard the Senator from Iowa acknowledge that there is some merit in the plan. It preserves all the machinery for settlement, although it eliminates the absolute prohibition to strike or to lockout.

Senators know that the provision in the Senate bill can not become law, whereas the provisions contemplated by these amendments may become law. On that ground, if for no other reason, I should seek support of the amendment in this Chamber.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to occupy merely a moment of the Senate's time for the purpose of explaining why I cast the last vote which I did upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. His amendment was to strike out a number of sections following each other consecutively. Those sections embraced what I might call the provisions of the bill erecting the controversy-adjusting machinery and the sections providing for the antistrike legislation. Therefore, as the question was put, Senators were invited to express their judgment upon whether or not all those sections should go out. I would gladly have voted to strike out the antistrike sections had the motion been confined to them, but I was opposed to striking out the sections which set up the dispute-adjusting machinery. Therefore I voted against the whole motion. Ultimately, I have hoped that the Senate would reach the position offered by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], because that plan of handling disputes seems to me, in the light of experience supplied by the various nations of the earth up to date at least, to be about the best available. Therefore I shall vote for and support the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In reference to the pending amendment, which has been tendered by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], I desire to remark that that amendment serves to bring very forcibly before the Senate the proposition so frequently asserted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that the provisions in respect to this subject in the bill do not forbid any man to quit work, either singly or in combination with any number of employees. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, however, does so, and does so in express terms. I do not believe that anyone who has given very serious consideration to the subject can doubt that it is wholly beyond the power of the Congress of the United States to make penal the quitting of work by any man, individually or in combination with anyone else; that is to say, contemporaneously with anyone else. The bill goes no further, as I interpret it, than to penalize, not the man who quits work, either singly or contemporaneously with any number of men, but the man who endeavors to get others to quit work in order that the railway system of the country may be paralyzed and tied up.

The Senator from Illinois might possibly reframe his amendment to meet the objection, but I venture to say that as it stands it can not possibly be sustained as a constitutional enactment. I invite attention to its language.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Montana refers to the language at the bottom of page 3 and top of page 4 of the amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do. That language reads:

> Any employee of a carrier subject to this act who ceases or quits work in combination with other employees thereof, prior to or within 60 days after the publication of such report, for the purpose of inducing or compelling such carrier to grant or continue to grant terms of employment, or for the purpose of helping other employees to induce or compel their employer to grant or continue to grant terms of employment, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both.

I think that indisputably makes the quitting of work an offense; that is, to say that a man is obliged to continue in his employment under the penalty of the law. That is clearly involuntary servitude and nothing less than involuntary servitude. So I feel that to adopt this amendment in its present form—it might perhaps be amended to meet that situation—but in its present form I feel that it would be ineffective.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Montana, who has made the point, I think very aptly, to turn to page 66 of the pending bill, the print of October 22, which I presume he has before him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What section?

Mr. McCORMICK. Section 30, in the seventh line of the section, or thereabouts, which deals with this very subject matter. I ask the Senator from Montana to turn to that in order that he may suggest, if he will, language from the bill as reported which might be substituted for the language to which he raises the objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have section 30 before me, but it will take some time to prepare the proposed modification, and I dislike to undertake to propose a substitute expression for that of the Senator from Illinois at this time. I merely invite his attention to the difficulty in the amendment which he has tendered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not know the Senator had the floor; I do not desire to interrupt him. I know he is glad to yield, but I was unaware that he had the floor.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I think that the point made by the Senator from Montana is very well taken, and if I may have the time I shall endeavor to modify my amendment and offer other language in lieu of that to which he objects.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from Iowa desire me to yield to him?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only for a few moments. I do not think the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that this is not a Government board ought to pass entirely without some comment. I do not pretend to be particularly familiar with this bill, as I am not a member of the committee which reported it; but I notice that section 7 provides:

> There is hereby created a transportation board, which shall be composed of five members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

That clearly provides for the appointment of a Government board. It is just as much a Government board as is the Interstate Commerce Commission a Government board.

I read from the print of December 15; and in that print, on pages 63 and 64, it will appear that there is provision for special boards to be appointed by the transportation board; and one part of the amendment adopted by the Senate, which is on the page to which I refer, to wit, page 64, provides:

> If the special board of adjustment is evenly divided upon any question, the matter in dispute, together with all records of proceedings pertaining thereto, shall be referred to the board, whose decisions shall be final. The board shall certify to the commission all decisions of the special board of adjustment when approved by said board and all decisions by said board in cases referred to it promptly upon deciding the same, and said certificate shall be conclusive evidence before the commission of the matters so determined and certified.

There is a decision arrived at by the special board, and when approved by the transportation board it is sent to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the approval by the transportation board, of course, is its decision, and it is just as solemn and judicial a decision upon the findings and testimony and consideration of all the facts in the case as could be had upon a trial in court; and to say that the parties to a controversy, having submitted their case to a specially created tribunal created by the Congress of the United States for the consideration and decision of their disputes, after that decision had been solemnly rendered and the verdict pronounced could disobey it with impunity would be to haul down the American flag and to dissolve the Government.

Of course, I consider the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, entirely correct in saying that if that does not constitute a decision by a tribunal of the United States which should be respected and whose decision should be enforced, then there can be no such thing as judicial authority or respect for it in this country.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, like the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], I voted against the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to strike out because his motion included the striking out of all of the provisions with reference to wage-adjustment boards, of some of which I am very much in favor. I shall support the amendment of the Senator from Illinois as he proposes to modify it because I believe it to be much less objectionable than is the proposition contained in the bill itself.

Just a word with reference to what the original language, in my judgment, will accomplish.

The Senator from Iowa says that in his judgment all of the provisions of the bill with reference to the adjustment of wage disputes will be valueless unless there is this penalizing clause to compel and command respect to those decisions. If I misunderstood him, I hope he will correct me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Wisconsin did misunderstand me, but I want one very clear distinction made, because I must not be drawn into a false position. I do not think the Canadian statute is valueless.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. But what I said was that if we created Government tribunals for the adjudication of these disputes their work would be valueless unless their decisions were to be respected and obeyed.

Mr. LENROOT. Unless the law compelled respect for the decision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; unless there was some sanction, some penalty for such a violation of the adjudication as is found in these sections of the present bill.

Mr. LENROOT. That is exactly as I understood the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not want the Senator to imagine that I thought the conciliation law of Canada was entirely valueless.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, I did not so state. I stated that, as I understood the Senator from Iowa, his contention was that if these penalizing sections of the committee bill were stricken out the provisions with reference to the adjustment of wage disputes would be valueless.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my judgment.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. Now, Mr. President, while I fully agree with the Senator from Iowa that there should be some provision made which would prevent coercive strikes against the decision of a fair tribunal, I can not agree with him that the decisions of a fair tribunal would be valueless, because when the Senator makes that statement he assumes that in these cases, unless it is made a criminal offense, the employees of the roads will not abide by the decision; and I can not assume any such thing if there is a fair tribunal making a fair decision.

To my mind, however, the chief objection to the committee proposition is this:

While in the language of the bill itself it refers only to a conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce, what will be the construction given to that language when it comes to adjudication by the courts? In arguing that question, it is fair to recall the attention of the Senate to the construction given to this language by the committee itself, by the chairman thereof. Let me read from the report:

> A proposal to prohibit an agreement among workers to quit their employment at a given time—

It says nothing about interfering with interstate commerce or hindering it, but—> a proposal to prohibit an agreement among workers to quit their employment at a given time without substituting some other instrumentality for securing justice would not receive at the hands of Congress a moment's consideration.

What is the conclusion from that language? That the committee, in its opinion, has furnished some other instrumentality, and that the committee's construction of this language is that it does contain a prohibition of an agreement collectively to quit work.

It goes on:

> In making the strike unlawful—

Not distinguishing between the purpose of the strike to restrain or interfere with interstate commerce or a quitting in a collective body because the employees are not satisfied to continue longer under the terms of employment, but, using the general language—

> In making the strike unlawful it is obvious that there must be something given to the workers in exchange for it. The thing substituted for the strike should be more certain in attaining justice and should do what the strike can not do, namely, protect the great masses of the people who are not directly involved in the controversy. The committee has substituted for the strike the justice which will be administered by the tribunals created in the bill for adjudging disputes which may hereafter arise.

Now, what will be the construction of the courts if this language should finally be enacted into law? I have no doubt that in a very large number if not in a large majority of the cases where there was a collective quitting of work, although there may have been no coercive purpose whatever in it, the courts will imply from the act of quitting a violation of the provisions of this section; and I think anyone who is familiar with the course of the decisions will agree, not perhaps as to the percentage of cases where that would occur, but that that would be a very frequent occurrence.

Mr. President, it would have been easy for the committee to prevent coercive strikes—which are the only ones that we have any right, under the Constitution, to attempt to prevent—by providing in this bill that the decisions of this tribunal should be final for a given length of time and that for that time there would be no power, either in the carrier or in the tribunal, to grant any demand for any greater compensation to the employees than was fixed in that decision. Remove the incentive to strike and you will prevent coercive strikes and you will not need to make a criminal offense not only for coercive strikes but punishing them for doing what they ought to have the lawful right to do.

Mr. President, if these sections shall be ultimately stricken out, I shall offer an amendment to the previous provisions of the bill providing that if any employee whose wages are affected by the final decision of this tribunal shall quit the service of the carrier by which he is employed, he shall not for a period of four months thereafter be employed by any carrier subject to the act at a greater rate of compensation than that fixed in such final decision. So far as we have any right to interfere with the employee, that will accomplish it; but it will not in the slightest degree interfere with the exercise of the lawful right of the employee, in the absence of a contractual relation, to quit work when and as he may choose.

Mr. President, in my judgment, we certainly have no right to compel men, either singly or collectively, to work for a railroad against their will; and, to repeat the illustration that I think I used the other day, suppose that when this bill passes and these railroads go back to their owners the wages are reduced 25 per cent, and this tribunal—which is the transportation board in this bill, a tribunal which in all probability will be made up of former railway executives—approves that cut of 25 per cent. Are you going to put 2,000,000 men in jail in this country because they collectively agree that they will not longer remain in the service of the carrier at that wage? Yet that is exactly the situation that may well arise if the pending provisions of the bill are enacted into law.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

On page 4 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, as printed, in line 1, I move to strike out the words "ceases or quits work in combination with other employees thereof," insert a comma after the word "who"; and on line 7, after the word "employment," insert the matter which I will not read, but send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "ceases or quits work in combination with other employees thereof"; and, in line 7, after the word "employment," insert "enters into any combination or agreement for the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or in pursuance of any such combination or agreement, and with like purpose, substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, shall be guilty," and so forth.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois accepts the amendment, which he has a right to do. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I see by a reference to this amendment that the Senator from Illinois has attempted to cover the objections which I had in my mind. It seemed to me rather doubtful whether we could take possession of an employee of a common carrier, simply because the carrier was engaged in interstate commerce, and penalize him for anything that he might do. But I see now that the Senator from Illinois has incorporated into his amendment substantially the same language that is outlined in the bill itself upon that point.

Therefore the objection I have to urge, Mr. President, is just what I urged before, namely, that it seems to me that we are put in the intolerable position of creating Government instrumentalities, Government boards, to adjudicate the merits of a controversy between an employee or a number of employees and their employer, and after the adjudication is entered and the whole country advised that the Government has found that the employer is wrong, or that the employee is wrong, then the employer may disregard it entirely and lock out the employees and cease to operate its transportation system; and if the employees do not want to abide by the judgment of the Government, they may combine and conspire to interrupt, hinder, delay, and prevent commerce between the States, although the controversy has been submitted to the duly constituted agents of the Government and has been decided.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that a procedure of that kind will tend to prevent strikes nearly so effectively as the procedure we have proposed in this bill, nor do I believe that there would be the same sense of responsibility upon the part of the agencies of the Government which entered upon the investigation and which rendered the decision. If no one is obliged to obey or respect it, if the carrier the next moment can say, "I will not pay the men the wages which the Government has said I ought to pay them," and if the employee can say to his fellow employees, "Come, we need pay no regard to what has been done; we can combine and conspire to our hearts' content to secure and enforce the demands which we originally made," it seems to me that we will not have gone very far toward the settlement of disputes and securing industrial peace. All we want, of course, is industrial continuity and regularity. We want men to receive good wages and we want them to work under fair and proper conditions; but why submit that to the Government save through tribunals of investigation, such as congressional investigating tribunals? These boards would be of no greater value than an investigation by Congress, with a publication of the facts elicited in the investigation; probably less valuable.

If we adopt this amendment I can not think that we will have responded to the demands of this time. I am not speaking of the demands of capital, I am speaking of the demands of the great peace-loving and orderly hundred millions of people who believe that there ought to be some way of adjusting these disputes as they arise, a way that will secure the regularity and the continuity of commerce among the States.

I can only repeat my hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. Section 29 of the bill as reported reads as follows:

> Any carrier or any officer of any carrier knowingly refusing to obey the decision of said committee after it has been approved by the board or of said regional boards of adjustment, or of the board in cases referred to it as hereinabove provided, shall be guilty, etc.

In other words, all that is necessary to make the carrier, or an officer of the carrier, guilty is to show that the decision has been rendered and approved and that the officer has knowingly refused to obey it. What does the Senator's amendment provide in that respect? Does it permit the carrier or officer of a carrier after 60 days to disregard the opinion or decision of the board?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator may learn as much if he will turn to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not had an opportunity to do it. I had a copy of the amendment awhile ago, but lost it, and when I went to look for it could not find it. I thought the Senator could tell me.

Mr. McCORMICK. The same provision holds for one as for the other.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In other words, after 60 days a carrier or officer can refuse to obey the decision.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dial	Harris	Lenroot
Ball	Dillingham	Harrison	McCormick
Bankhead	Edge	Henderson	McKellar

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as I understand the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] it would prohibit employees of the railroads from conspiring to impede or interrupt interstate commerce while the question in dispute was under investigation, but would not prohibit them from doing so after the board which was investigating the matter had decided the dispute.

I am very much impressed with the idea that if any distinction is to be made as to whether they shall be prohibited from impeding or interrupting interstate commerce one time or the other with reference to the decision of an official tribunal which is investigating the case, it would be much more logical to do it after it had decided rather than before. After the decision then there is an official finding, a fixed point, so far as in the defects of human reason it is possible for the Government to arrive at a fact in a controverted question, something upon which action can be taken.

It would be perfectly reasonable, at least there might be advanced good reasons why, before that point had been arrived at, no inhibition should be imposed upon the men, and that after it had been arrived at they should be bound by the official finding of the Government.

So it seems to me that the amendment, instead of dealing reasonably with the problem to which this section relates, puts it upon a very illogical ground.

As to the bill itself, a great deal has been said before the committee and before the Senate about the great wrong of compelling men to work against their will, a form of slavery. Instead of doing anything of that kind, the bill expressly provides in language so clear that no possible doubt could be entertained that no man shall be interfered with in his right to quit work. What it prohibits is not the quitting of work. There is nothing even said about a strike in the bill. It prohibits the men from conspiring together to interfere with interstate commerce. It provides a means by which disputes between employers and employees in regard to wages and conditions of labor can be officially determined.

If two citizens have a dispute with each other about a piece of property, they are required to go into an official tribunal for the settlement of that dispute. One of them is not allowed to enforce his claim against another by violence. A dispute between one set of people in the country, we will say the employees, and another set, we will say the employers of the railroads, about wages, is a dispute really about values; it is a dispute about money, and if there is in the principle of our Government the necessity of requiring individual citizens to submit disputes about property to the courts in order that peace may be maintained and the security of person and property preserved by an orderly procedure under the Constitution, I fail to see why a dispute which is just as much a dispute about values and about property as the individual dispute about a piece of land or personal goods should not likewise be required by law to be submitted to an official tribunal in order that its decision might take the place of the violence of one party or other.

Before the Interstate Commerce Committee representatives of the employees appeared and objected not only to the so-called strike provision, but objected to the wage-adjustment board and all of the machinery that is provided for the settlement of disputes. They were asked what they would substitute for that official tribunal in the settlement of disputes. They said they would substitute for it the labor union.

There, Mr. President, seems, so far as the position taken by those particular representatives of organized railway employees is concerned, although stated in that comparatively mild form, the full extent of what is called direct action. That means the elimination of the Government in the settlement of disputes and the vesting by the employees in themselves of the sole power of determining the question. If it is to be left to the organized employees, then it will be left to one of the parties to the dispute to decide upon its own case. How would they decide it, and what is there that is to be viewed in the interest of the public as well as the employees and the railroad companies? The same thing that is involved when we prevent, if we can, with all the power of the Government, the coercion and intimidation of public officials. If men engaged in a dispute should surround Congress with a cordon of bayonets and declare that the Members should not leave the building alive until this law should be passed or that law should be defeated, it would be no more the application of force and violence in the processes of Government than if they should suspend transportation or should cut off the supply of fuel or when they should say to the millions of our people that they shall not have food to sustain life until their demands as to dollars and cents are granted.

The purpose of the section of the bill at which the amendment is aimed is to substitute law for force in the settlement of disputes between citizens. The entire principle of orderly government is involved. It is only from the tolerant indifference of the American people, inculcated by the great fortune which we have enjoyed and the abounding riches of the land, that we have tolerated so long the violence, the intimidation, the suffering, and the death which have come from the common practice of the use of force in the form of the suppression of industries essential to life as a means of settling private disputes.

It seems to me that the time has now come in the increase of this evil in its extreme form, in recent months, to cast aside the indifference with which we have treated it in the past and to deal with it as a vital governmental problem, to apply to it the same principles of constitutional power that regulate the action of individuals. Why should men, because they are numerous or because they are organized, be put into a different class in their relations to the Government and to the law from individuals who are not organized, but whose property and whose lives and whose actions are just as important to them as are the desires of those who control great combinations, whether of labor or capital.

The only difference is that one has more power than the other; and so the question arises whether certain classes shall be allowed with perfect impunity merely because they have power, because they are numerous, because they are so situated that they can apply violence, can interfere with transportation, with the distribution of the necessities of life—because they have power, that we shall give them the special privilege of determining for themselves the industrial controversies in which they are engaged?

There is not anything in the Constitution of the United States which requires the Government to make such an exception, and there is nothing, in my opinion, in the mere fact that they are strong or numerous or organized that justifies the adoption of such a governmental policy. On the contrary, it seems to me that by reason of the very fact that they are powerful, that they attempt to intimidate the Government, that they can cause suffering to the entire Nation, they should be subjected to the power of the Government, acting through the laws of Congress and the administration of tribunals established thereunder in the settlement of disputes as other people are subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the point that the bill does not even go to the extent of subjecting them to governmental orders of any description. It goes only to the extent of making them submit their controversies to an arbitral board consisting of four of their own representatives and four of the representatives of the opposite interest. Although it is a governmentally appointed board, it is not a Government board.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Although it is true, as the Senator from Mississippi says, that the employees have 50 per cent of the membership of the board, yet it is a tribunal that is established by law and thus is a Government institution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. President, of course, that is true. It is a governmentally appointed board, just like a bipartisan board of two Democrats and two Republicans might be governmentally appointed, but it would not represent the Democratic Party nor the Republican Party nor the Government; it would represent the conflicting interests.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But that is a mere academic question, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; it is not academic, because it is very peculiarly intimate and essential.

Now, if the Senator will pardon for one moment longer, there is an essential difference between a bureaucratic board appointed by the Government outside of all the interests concerned and a mutually interested board appointed by both parties and both appointed by the Government. My objection to this scheme, if I had one to make——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I will have to decline further to yield just now because I am going to conclude in a moment, and then I will yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted to say——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield further at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This bill does not even require the employees, as the Senator from Mississippi has stated, to submit their disputes to the tribunal which is provided by the law. It establishes a tribunal and permits them to submit their disputes to it if they see fit. They do not have to do so; they need not remain in the employment in which they are engaged if they do not care to do so. What the law does provide is that they shall not use the instrumentality of interfering with or cutting off interstate commerce as a means of enforcing their will upon the Government and upon the people of this country in the settlement of their disputes.

In regard to the nature of the tribunal I fail to see that the fact that each side is represented changes its character in any way as a governmental tribunal. As just suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the chairman of the committee, the findings of this board do not go into effect until they are approved by the transportation board.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say in justification of my vote against this amendment that at various times in the past I have engaged in efforts to break up what I have regarded as control of political parties in this country, and, through that, the control of the Government, by special interests. I regard the question that is now presented by this section and by the amendment as an identical question, although the special interest is a different one. There is no principle in our Government which should tolerate the control of the Government or of any of its functions by any special class, whether it is that of business or of capital or of organized labor. All should be treated with absolute fairness, but special exemption or special power should be given to none.

So far as the people of this country are concerned, organized labor need not fear to submit its just and reasonable claims to the sympathy and conscience of the American public. It will find a liberal consideration and generous action on the part of the people at the polls and through their governmental agencies in providing for labor adequate wages and reasonable conditions of work. For those things I have stood and continue to stand; but I stand also, Mr. President, for the principle that the Government is a government by the people, that it is superior to labor and it is superior to capital, and must be for all and supreme over all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in the first place there never was a government by the people—there never has been and there never will be. There is a government by the representatives of the people, and the people are trusted to choose representatives. Outside of the remote Greek and Italian cities—the Greek cities in ancient times and the Italian cities in the Middle Ages—there never was any government that pretended to be a government by the people. There have been governments for the people and of the people by the representatives of the people, and that is the sort of Government we are. All the falderal talk about a government by the people—by Jim and Sam and Dick and Peter and John—is absolute foolishness. It never occurred outside of a little city, and it never will occur, even inside of an American State—not even in Delaware or Rhode Island, where you can cross the border in three jumps. So much for that.

Mr. President, I come to the immediate point under discussion; and if the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] had yielded to me a little longer I would have made it clear, and would not have had to have taken my feet to talk about it now. The difference between arbitration for the settlement of a controversy and settling a controversy by one's own power, perforce, is so immense that nobody needs draw the distinction. This bill merely fixes a method of appointing arbitrators. It does not even go to the extent that the Senator from Washington seems to think it goes. There is no Government board at all. It is a governmentally appointed board, but it consists of four representatives of the employees and four representatives of the employers. It is just as if the United States said to Great Britain in connection with some Canadian fishery question: "We will appoint two men and you will appoint two men, and, if necessary, they will appoint a fifth." This bill does not even go to the point in saying that, if necessary, they will appoint a fifth.

The trouble with the bill is that it leaves a certain degree of impotency in the very verbiage of it. There might come a time when the representatives of labor would say one thing and the representatives of ownership would say another thing, and then the public would be helpless. Of course, we are all hoping that that will not happen, but there is no reason to object to the provisions of the bill on that account. There might be reason to object because the bill does not go further and appoint an arbitrator who would represent the public; there may be reason to object because the bill does not go further and appoint four more men who would represent the public. The weakness of the provision consists in the fact that you are left with four men on one side and four men on the other side, and perhaps they will vote as the Democratic and Republican Senators and judges did in the Hayes-Tilden election—strictly according to party lines. We all thought at that time that there could not be organized a tribunal consisting of five Senators, five Members of the House of Representatives, and five judges of the Supreme Court that would all vote according to party lines, but they did, and they voted strictly along party lines. You may find this thing to fail in that respect, but you will not find it to fail in the respect in which the Senator is questioning it.

The provision as it is ought to pass, not because I can not improve it, not because the Senator from Washington can not improve it, but because it is the best thing we can get right now. Let it go to some sort of conference, and let something come out, and let the American people be satisfied about it somehow.

Mr. President, if there is anything I despise it is the idea of compromising on a principle, but now and then I am brought up taut where I must compromise on a principle, and I am brought up in this bill with that situation. The Senator from Washington can not object to the bill upon the ground that it is a governmental agency, because it is not; I can not object to it upon that ground. I might object to it, if I wanted to, upon the ground that they had arranged the arbitral tribunal so that perhaps it might nullify itself and could not do any particular good; but after it goes into operation, then we will find out that we must settle that issue at some time, and we must appoint some other members of the board of arbitration.

The main thing, however, Mr. President, consists in this—and that is possibly where the Senator and I might take issue with one another—I say that there is no sort of controversy between man and man, no sort of controversy between capital and labor, no sort of controversy between one industry and another industry, and no sort of controversy between nation and nation that ought not to be settled by fair arbitration rather than to be settled by blood. Of course, when international controversy as now constituted comes, it is settled by the blood of armies and navies; when industrial controversy comes to be settled, it is by the blood of policemen's billies upon the heads of men who are striking or by strikers' billies upon the heads of "scabs," but, all the same, the eternal, everlasting rule still prevails that out of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, men ought never to confess, no matter how impotent, weak, and despicable they may be, that in any international or interindustrial or interclass war they can not settle it by fair arbitration. The only question is how shall you erect the arbitral board?

This bill erects an arbitral board that is half and half. It ought to be third and third—third labor, third capital, and third public—but, at any rate, if we erect it half and half—half capital and half labor—we have gone that far and that is further than we have ever gone before. That is better than for some men to kill other men who want to work because they say they are "scabs"; that is better than for Pennsylvania mounted guards to kill men because they are striking; that is better than arraigning the whole public animosity of one or the other class in the United States to be arraigned for one class against another without refuge. That is better than waiting for the millennium, when men will agree not to quarrel. Men will always quarrel, and the only thing left is to fix some sort of arbitral tribunal that can settle their controversies; and an honest man, a straight man, who confesses the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, will always submit his controversies to a tribunal outside of himself and outside of his own interest and not in his own interest. He will do that industrially, internationally, interclassically, just as we do when man meets man before a court of justice in a civilized community.

In Turkey you can not find where man meets man before a judicial tribunal; you can not find it in Arabia; but you find it in America, you find it in England, you find it in all the Anglo-Saxon countries, you find it in all civilized countries.

Mr. President, the whole thing comes down to this, and it has got to come to that finally: Nations, classes, industrialism, everything, must agree to have controversies settled by a fair arbitral tribunal of some sort erected for the purpose of settling those controversies. In erecting the tribunal, of course, many mistakes will be made—at the beginning a great many, and later on, by evolution, they will be corrected—but the everlasting word of God is that you must not be the judge in your own quarrel. Whether a national quarrel or an industrial quarrel or an individual quarrel, you must not set yourself up to be the judge in your own quarrel. Neither the United States must do that, nor the labor organizations within the United States must do that, nor the capitalists within the United States must do that, nor must you do that.

There is a higher law than you or me. There is a higher law than capital and labor. There is a higher law than the United States. There is a higher law than any nation that ever existed, and that is the law of justice, and of seeking some tribunal that must administer justice, and must administer justice by preconsent, by consent granted beforehand, by free-will.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in my opinion the only justification there is for legislating at all upon the subject with which we are now dealing is to avert, if possible, the unspeakable calamity, involving 110,000,000 people, which would result from a general tie-up of the railroad systems of the United States; and if we undertake that task at all it seems to me we ought to go to the logical conclusion in it and not deal with it in a halting, half-hearted way, stopping at a way station.

If, Mr. President, it is, as has been asserted, involuntary servitude to make it penal to foment, incite, engineer, or conduct a strike in violation of the final adjudication of an arbitral tribunal, it is no less involuntary servitude to make it penal in the same manner to do the same things prior to the final adjudication; and I made the suggestion that I did a short while ago to the Senator from Illinois, whose amendment is now before the Senate, in order to emphasize as well as I could the idea that it is entirely unsound to say that the provisions of the bill as it has been reported involve involuntary servitude at all.

But, Mr. President, I want to call attention to what I believe to be a fatal vice in the plan represented by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, namely, that that arbitral tribunal, called upon to determine in the final analysis what is a just or fair wage, recognizing that, notwithstanding the adjudication it may make, a strike may nevertheless be fomented, incited, engineered, and carried on, will be acting under the greatest possible compulsion to render a decision which inclines beyond what justice would require toward the demands of those who might thus precipitate the strike.

Mr. President, we are legislating upon this subject because the Congress of the United States heretofore has been called upon to legislate in the very face of an impending strike, and in order to avert the catastrophe that would follow by reason of it. Whatever may be said about the Adamson Act that was passed in 1916, I believe that the Congress of the United States was entirely justified in the legislation at that time. It was enacted at that time not because the principles it involved or the remedy it provided were deemed to be entirely just and right. There can be no doubt that many yielded their judgment, if they had any, about the matter simply to avert that kind of a catastrophe. Under the plan proposed by the Senator from Illinois that arbitral tribunal will be under exactly the same kind of compulsion. It should be relieved from any influence of that character. It should be relieved from any dread that such a result might ensue by reason of the judgment which it renders.

Mr. President, whenever you take away from the laboring men of this country, or any part of them, the right to strike—that is to say, to engineer and carry on a strike, and precipitate a universal cessation of labor in their particular employment for any purpose whatever which may be lawful in its character—you must thereupon give to them a tribunal before which they may go and be heard concerning the just and fair wage which they ought to receive, or the change in conditions which they demand. When you do that, Mr. President, they, as law-abiding citizens, ought to yield cheerful obedience to the adjudication thus rendered, just the same as every man in this country is obliged to submit his controversies with his neighbor to a court, and to abide by the decision. But, Mr. President, that tribunal ought to be fairly constituted. It ought to be so constituted as that there can be no doubt that justice will be done in the determination as to what is the fair wage or the proper conditions.

It is suggested in this connection that this particular tribunal, the transportation board, to which the matter may ultimately come, is not a fair tribunal. If so, Mr. President, it ought to be displaced, and the power ought to be reposed in some other body, constituted in some other way, so that the disposition to decide against the laboring man, if any such disposition could be deemed to exist, would be entirely removed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, it is suggested that this board will be composed of railroad men, with prejudices against the operatives. I see nothing in the bill which leads me to believe that that board will be composed of men skilled in the operation of railroads and in the management of railroads. They are not charged in any way with the operation of these railroads. They are not charged, as is the present Railroad Administration, with the financing and the general operation of railroads.

All those tasks are returned to the owners of the roads and to their representatives, the officers of the corporations that own them. Supervisory powers of a large and wide character are given to the transportation board; but there is no reason for assuming, so far as I can see, that they are to be selected from men trained in railroad work or from railroad managers. But if that is the case, Mr. President, it simply affords a justification for a remodeling of those sections which repose the adjudicatory powers in that transportation board, and some other board ought to be constituted. That is no reason, as it seems to me, why we should hesitate to make it penal to disregard the final adjudication of the arbitral board.

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that this matter of final arbitrament ought not to be put in this transportation board, because the board, under the terms of this bill, will have general supervision of the management and control of the railroads themselves. If they are not trained railroad men they ought to be trained railroad men, and they will be obliged to be trained railroad men before they have been there very long. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that in order to be absolutely fair and just to both sides of the controversy we ought to have a fair tribunal of which no one can complain.

I agree with the Senator about the necessity of having some tribunal, but to my mind it ought not to be in the slightest degree capable of being charged that the final arbiter will be biased in any way whatsoever. For my part, I do not know how they can be selected. I am rather inclined to think that the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has shown itself fair toward all persons, toward the public and toward the railroads, and toward the employees of the railroads, would be a better arbiter than this untried board that is to be, by the terms of the bill, composed of three members from one political party and two from the other, and liable to be changed by the incoming administrations. It does not seem to me that that is the fair and just tribunal of arbitration to which the Senator gives his approval.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator will not understand me at all as having given my unqualified approval to reposing these powers in this particular board. I am not discussing that matter now, and, indeed, Mr. President, I should like very much, indeed, to have some one tender an amendment which would contemplate reposing these final arbitral powers in some other board constituted in some other way, so that we could have an enlightened discussion concerning the wisdom of reposing those powers in this particular board. That is not the proposition I am talking about. That is no reason whatever why the determination of the arbitral board should not be final and its adjudications enforced by penal provisions.

I insist, Mr. President, that that argument is an argument which merely goes to the necessity of a revision of the other provisions of the bill under which these powers are thus reposed in the transportation board. If there is no valid objection, Mr. President, to the discharge of these duties by that board, rather than by some other board constituted in some other way, there seems to me no reason for objecting upon that ground to these provisions making penal a disregard of the final adjudications of the transportation board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him to state his view on one point. I have very great respect for the views of the Senator from Montana on any question to which he devotes his attention, and before he takes his seat I would like to have his views on the value of the Canadian system, such as the Senator from Illinois has proposed here. What are the reasonable objections to that? If the Senator discussed it while I was temporarily out of the Chamber he need not repeat the discussion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I spoke about it only briefly. My study of the Canadian system leads me to believe that it is substantially the same in principle as that of the amendment tendered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], and I am urging that we ought to go to whatever length we can, and not leave open, if we can avoid it at all, the possibility of the unspeakable calamity upon 110,000,000 of people of the tying up of the entire transportation system of this country, with all the misery that that condition necessarily entails.

In the second place, I urge that there is a fatal vice in that system, because the transportation board, finally dealing with the problem upon which the other adjustment board was divided in opinion, will be always acting under the dread and fear that there will be a strike, regardless of the decision which they may make in the case, and that, therefore, they will be operating under a compulsion and a coercion to which we ought not to subject them.

That is why we are legislating about the matter now. We are legislating upon the subject now in order to escape such a calamity. We are legislating upon the subject so that the Congress of the United States will not be, as it has been in the past, legislating in the face of an impending strike, with all of the misery that that entails.

The Senator from Tennessee will agree that that situation of affairs is not conducive to the very best kind of legislation, and equally it is not a condition to which judges ought to be subjected in the determination of a great controversy.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I am very much in favor of arbitration, but I can not give my consent to any kind of arbitration that I do not believe gives both sides an absolutely fair and square deal; and I do not think this provision of the bill does give both sides that kind of a deal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I understand the Senator from Utah wishes recognition in order to submit a report. I can not agree to that pending a vote on this amendment. I make the point of no quorum now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I make the point of order against that. My understanding is that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call. I think we can get a vote on it.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Chair holds that debate constitutes no business, of course the point is well taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not business.

WAR RISK BUREAU PAYMENTS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is that he has a bill he wishes to report, in which all Senators are very much interested, and about which there is no difference of opinion, it being for the benefit of those who suffered in the war. I am perfectly willing to allow that bill to be passed. I am assuming that it will lead to no discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war risk insurance act. I ask for its present consideration. I feel certain that it will lead to no debate. If it does, I will withdraw it immediately.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah whether this is the so-called Sweet bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the Sweet bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My attention has been called to a large number of proposed amendments to the bill, suggested in the interests of the soldiers.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the commander in chief of the American Legion spent nearly two hours with me yesterday afternoon upon the amendments agreed to, and I will say that he and other members of the American Legion desire to have the bill passed as I have reported it at the earliest moment possible. If the Senator wants any information on it I will be glad to give it to him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is a House bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a House bill—the so-called Sweet bill—which I was directed to report from the Finance Committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. With amendments?

Mr. SMOOT. With amendments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. With amendments to the House bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; to the House bill.

Mr. KIRBY. I suggest that the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask the Senator from Utah if the bill deals with the establishment of the War Risk Insurance Bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. That is provided for in another bill. This deals with the compensation for the disabled soldiers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does not in any way change the administration of the act?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Utah whether this is a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On the House bill or the Senate bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a House bill with amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is known as the Sweet bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Sweet bill.

Mr. KIRBY. Has it been considered in the Senate before at all?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am just reporting it from the committee.

Mr. KIRBY. I myself have never seen the bill before.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance expects that this bill is going to be enacted into law before the end of this month and has already directed that checks for the present month be made out for the disabled soldiers on the basis of this bill. This bill ought to be passed this evening. It may have to go to conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the matter develops into debate, I shall ask the Senator to withdraw it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is a very important measure and ought to have been passed long ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill. Debate is out of order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that if the bill is to be read we may have order so that we may hear it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I say a word in regard to this matter? I understand this bill carries about $80,000,000, and is, aside from the amount, of great importance. I have had a great deal of correspondence with regard to this matter. I have now some 15 or 16 amendments on my desk which were presented to me yesterday by a member of the legion, asking that they be inserted or be submitted to this bill. I do not know that I should be able to answer the gentlemen who asked me to offer these amendments, if I should find out afterwards that they were not on the bill, as to why I did not see to it. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that however important this measure may be, and however just and wise it may be, we have some duty to perform in regard to it, and that is to see that it corresponds with what we think it ought to have in it. We ought to be permitted to read it and know its terms. It may be just what we want, but it may be defective in some respects. Let us at least know what we are doing.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Senator from Idaho was in the Chamber when I made the statement that I spent nearly two hours yesterday with the commander in chief of the American Legion and other soldiers in discussing the amendments to the House bill, and all want this bill passed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I assume that the bill will be passed, and I assume that it ought to be passed. But may we not have at least 12 hours in which to read it and look into it——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will withdraw the bill.

Mr. BORAH. And to know that these things which are to be incorporated in it are in it? I think it is an extraordinary procedure to pass a bill carrying eighty millions of dollars which the Senate of the United States does not know a thing about.

Mr. SMOOT. It is an extraordinary request, Mr. President, but we must remember it is for an extraordinary set of men.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so, and for an extraordinary set of men, and for that reason it is extremely important that every man in this Senate Chamber should know that he has done his duty when it shall have passed. Let us do what we ought to do for these men, but be sure that we are doing the right and proper thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has withdrawn the bill.

Mr. KIRBY. I would suggest that the Senator from Utah ask that the bill be printed, so that we can know what is in it. He need not withdraw it.

Mr. SMOOT. I promised not to take the time of the Senate if the bill should lead to discussion.

Mr. KIRBY. It will not take any time to have it printed.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is already printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it desired that it shall be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it ought to be printed in bill form, showing the amendments, and I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go to the calendar, and be printed in the usual form.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	McCormick	Smith, S. C.
Ball	Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Smoot
Bankhead	Gay	McLean	Spencer
Borah	Gerry	McNary	Stanley
Calder	Hale	Moses	Sterling
Capper	Harris	New	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Henderson	Newberry	Thomas
Colt	Hitchcock	Nugent	Trammell
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Underwood
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kellogg	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Dillingham	Kenyon	Ransdell	Warren
Edge	Keyes	Sheppard	Williams
Elkins	King	Sherman	Wolcott
Fernald	Kirby	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The years and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CUMMINS (when his name was called). Upon this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWENS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I am paired with him during his absence, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. NELSON's name was called). The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. If present, the Senator from Nebraska would vote "yea" and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

Mr. NEWBERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. In his absence from the Chamber I am obliged to withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is detained on account of the illness of his wife. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in reference to my pair that I did heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I am informed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that if the senior Senator from Pennsylvania were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK. I make the same announcement as heretofore of my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay." I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CALDER. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and if present would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Ashurst	France	Lenroot	Sheppard
Borah	Gay	McCormick	Sherman
Capper	Gerry	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Harris	McNary	Stanley
Colt	Henderson	Moses	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kenyon	Nugent	Wolcott

Gronna	Nelson	Shields
Harding	Norris	Simmons
Harrison	Owen	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. MCCORMICK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall offer the amendment in the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, after line 2, insert the following:

That the term "transportation" as used in the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, shall be deemed to include refrigerator cars of efficient type or types approved by the board for the transportation of fresh meat. It shall be the duty of every carrier by rail subject to the provisions of said act to provide such cars in number sufficient from time to time to accommodate the reasonable need therefor on its lines, and to furnish the same with due promptness upon reasonable request therefor and without unjust discrimination; and such carriers otherwise with respect to said cars shall be governed by the provisions of said act relating to transportation.

No carrier by rail subject to the provisions of said act shall, after the expiration of six months from the date of passage of this act, employ in commerce any refrigerator cars for the transportation of fresh meat, which are not owned or controlled by such carrier, except upon the condition that they may be furnished by the carrier to any person making reasonable request for refrigerator cars in accordance with the provisions of this section, under such arrangements as to just compensation and otherwise as may be made between the carrier and such person owning or controlling the same, with the approval of the board. The agreement embodying such arrangements shall be submitted in writing to the board for approval, and if not disapproved by it within 30 days after such submission, shall be deemed to have been approved by it.

The failure by any such carrier to perform any duty or to comply with any requirement prescribed by this section shall be deemed to be an unjust practice within the meaning of said act of February 4, 1887, as amended, and said carrier shall be subject to all the liabilities, prosecutions, and penalties provided therein for unjust practices by carriers, except that the amount of penalty for knowingly failing or neglecting to obey an order of the board in reference thereto shall be $100 for each offense instead of $5,000 as provided in section 16 of said act; and any distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be considered a separate offense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not critically examined the phraseology of this amendment, but its spirit is entirely in harmony with the remainder of the bill and I hope it will be accepted, in order that it may go into conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there was so much confusion in the Chamber when the amendment was read that half of the amendment was read before it was possible to understand its provisions. I do not know what is in the amendment; I do not know how far-reaching it is; and really do not know what it means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will suspend a moment. The Chair is to blame for permitting the confusion in the Chamber and accepts the responsibility. Will Senators kindly cease audible conversation?

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. POMERENE.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if this amendment provides that the railroad operators shall have the right to take the refrigerator cars of a corporation or an individual and assign such cars anywhere upon their lines, to be shipped anywhere in the United States?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, one of the serious difficulties we have had in transportation relates to the meat-packing industry. Many of those companies have such cars, and often they are not in use; they can be used and they are used on roads belonging to private companies. These cars have been used in such a way as to bring about a discrimination against certain other people. It is the duty of the railway companies to furnish suitable cars for the traffic; and the purpose of this amendment is to authorize the transportation board, so denominated in the bill, to require the companies to supply themselves with the necessary cars.

It is also one of the objects of this legislation that there shall be an equitable distribution of cars, to the end that all shippers may receive an equitable service. To that end it is provided that the cars which they have may be counted in the matter of the allotment. I am not quoting with entire exactness, but that is the purpose. I think the purpose is entirely clear, as set out in the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, the cars that are owned by private corporations are to be counted in connection with the cars which the transportation company may furnish, and are then to be assigned as the board may decide?

Mr. POMERENE. They are entitled to certain rentals, and so forth, which may be prescribed.

Mr. SMOOT. I see no objection to the amendment if the railroad furnishes the requisite number of refrigerator cars; but supposing the road should say, "We have no cars."

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator will find that the amendment gives the transportation board plenary power, so that they can require the company to furnish the cars. Of course, it is conceivable that one large concern might have a number of cars which it was not needing, or that there was not an equitable distribution, and that the supply of cars was being used for monopolistic purposes, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think that the meat packers who are referred to by the Senator from Ohio would in any way object to having the refrigerator cars operated by the railroads and letting the railroad money go into those cars if they could get the cars when they needed them.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not any doubt that they would be served equitably and properly in that matter.

Mr. SMOOT. But, of course, no great packing industry could operate successfully unless it had the cars when it was absolutely necessary to have them in order to move their products.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Utah, perhaps, does not have in mind the special provisions of law which are known as the car-service act, which were amplified in a bill which was passed by the Congress several years ago. The provisions of the so-called car-service act have been broadened in this bill so that the transportation board will have entire control of that subject, and it is going to prevent having a lot of empties in one section of the country when there is a great demand for cars in other sections. The amendment simply carries out the spirit of that act.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment by inserting after the words "fresh meat" the words "vegetables and fruits."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Florida to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment offered by Mr. POMERENE, on page 1, line 5, after the words "fresh meat," it is proposed to insert the words "vegetables and fruits."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I offer this as a suggestion: The Senator's amendment adds "vegetables and fruits." Why not add the words "or other perishable articles"?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does the Senator mean, instead of saying "vegetables and fruits," to say "vegetables and other perishable articles"?

Mr. POMERENE. No; use the words "vegetables and fruits," if that is desired, and add "or other perishable articles."

Mr. TRAMMELL. So that it would read: "Vegetables, fruits, and other perishable articles"?

Mr. POMERENE. That is the suggestion I make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida modify his amendment to that effect?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes, sir; I offer that as the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment as modified.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio relates to the distribution of cars and provides for a fair distribution with reference to certain commodities. The Senator from Florida makes the same provision apply to fruits and vegetables.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; and my amendment goes a little further than suggested by the Senator from Washington. It requires the companies to provide the cars and to provide for the method of distribution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all right.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Florida includes the words "and other perishable articles."

Mr. TRAMMELL. It does.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am glad that is so, for the reason that fish and similar commodities should also be included.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Secretary state the amendment as modified to the amendment, and then the Senator from Alabama will be recognized.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 5, of the amendment offered by Mr. POMERENE, after the words "fresh meat," it is proposed to insert the words "vegetables, fruits, and other perishable products."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer that amendment to the amendment. I am very much in sympathy with the object and purpose of the original amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. I believed that refrigerator car lines should be controlled and the cars should be furnished by the railroads instead of by independent car companies. I think there is no question that the shippers of produce who require refrigerator cars will get better service and more reasonable rates. Therefore I am most heartily in sympathy with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, with the amendment offered by myself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio where the refrigerator cars which the railroads are to own and operate are to come from? If the roads that now can not build freight cars and can not live without coming to the Government for large donations are expected to build and operate refrigerator cars, we will never have any refrigerator cars.

I am not going to detain the Senate in discussing this question; but I wish to make the prediction that if this amendment is adopted and it becomes the law of the land, one-half of the towns and much of the territory in this country will not have any refrigerator-car service; it will be impossible for them to have it. I think it is unfortunate to put the country in that situation. I do not mean to defend the present system of refrigerator-car service, but I do mean to say that, if this amendment is adopted and becomes a law, it will be found that at least one-half of the towns and much of the territory in this country will never have any refrigerator-car service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to add an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida. After the last word of his amendment I move to insert "exhibitions, shows, theatrical troupes, or private cars."

That is not, as it may appear, for the purpose of diminishing the force of this amendment. Ringling Bros., during their separate exhibitions and shows, at one time—I do not know what their cars may number now—had more than 200 cars of private, special manufacture, that were offered to the common carriers of the country. These have been greatly increased. It gave to those in the show business special advantages over the new exhibition or show that sought—and there are several of them in the United States—to obtain a profitable business. There are certain theatrical troupes that make an entire circuit of the United States, when they begin along the Atlantic coast, that travel in special cars. There are a number of private cars, used by gentlemen of means and leisure, offering themselves for transportation, and it is a considerable burden. Very often regular passenger trains are delayed, waiting at connections or terminal points for the special car of somebody who is late in making that connection. Now, if we are to equalize the service, I believe in equalizing all the service.

Ringling Bros. have lately consolidated with Barnum & Bailey's show. It now, instead of having probably 200 cars, may have 400 cars. It is the largest combination of public entertainment there is in the world. There is no small, single-tent, one-ring circus that can compete with it, or ever get on its feet, unless the lines of the United States offer similar accommodations to every young and struggling exhibition that is attempting to earn a place in the world of entertainment.

I offer this amendment in good faith, Mr. President. It is just as important that the people have entertainment, and that they see strange animals from foreign countries, and exhibitions of acrobatic and muscular skill from all parts of the world, as it is that they have fresh oranges and bananas. We can live without the latter; they are luxuries; but some form of entertainment is a necessity, as much as the daily food, meat, and bread.

Another thing: There is a limitation here, and let me say to those who are supporting this amendment that you will wreck the refrigerator-car business in the United States with the six-months' limit. On the 1st day of July last there were more than 45,000 refrigerator cars in the United States used by the carrier systems of the country. The greater part of those were owned by private concerns. The larger part of them were owned by the so-called "Big Five" packers.

Another thing: The packing houses were forced into the refrigerator-car business. Mr. Hammond or Nelson Morris years ago built the first refrigerator car. Nobody knows who was the original patentee of it, but along about the same time the refrigerator car came into use. Of the seven or eight large trunk lines leading out of Chicago, the fathers of the present owners of the principal packing houses in Chicago went to the traffic managers of the railways with their plans and asked them to build refrigerator cars. This is a matter of local history at that time; it is now national history and the development of the carrier system. There was not a railroad manager or board of directors in all the trunk lines leading out of Chicago in any direction that would build a refrigerator car. They said they had made enough experiments that lost the money of their stockholders, and they declined to invest a dollar in it. It was regarded as a chimerical enterprise. The packers of that pay, for the purpose of widening their market for fresh meats, decided to take the chance. They built the present refrigerator car, or its early type, and out of it came the refrigerator-car system of to-day. There was not a single railway found in New York City whose owners would put up a half million dollars to build the refrigerator cars that were needed at that time. These interests therefore were literally forced, if they took the benefit of the invention and spread the zone of fresh-meat distribution from the slaughterhouse, to build refrigerator cars. They did so. They proved to be a success not only for the transportation of fresh meats, but for the transportation of certain fruits.

There probably is not any one of the so-called tropical fruits, or those raised in warm countries going to northern markets, that to-day is not transported in what is in substance a refrigerator car. These cars are in every instance not like a meat car, because there is very little use that can be made of the empty return space in a refrigerator car for fruit.

The carrying of certain vegetables or fruits taints the car, and ordinarily a fresh-meat car can be devoted to no other purpose, unless it is something in sealed packages or cans, so that the odors can not permeate it. Now, with that condition it is proposed in this amendment within six months to prohibit a common carrier from transporting any form of refrigerator car that it does not itself own. That is an utter impossibility. Under present conditions there are not enough car-manufacturing plants in the United States to build the refrigerator cars necessary for the service. It can not be done unless you confiscate some 35,000 or 40,000 refrigerator cars now in the hands of private owners and belonging to them, built for their special service, and no more to be confiscated by the Government in peace times, if we ever declare peace, than it is possible to come and take my team of horses off the farm; no more to be taken, unless packers and owners agree to it, than you can take any other species of private property; and instead of promoting the interests of the public, it will stop the shipping of fruits from Florida, because in six months the private refrigerator cars can not be taken, and new ones can not be manufactured. It will stop the transportation of bananas, of oranges, of pineapples, and of all the lines of United Fruit Co. steamers that land at southern ports and send up their cargoes on the Illinois Central to all the great northern and northwestern markets. That requires a fruit car specially constructed and devised for the transportation of fruit in cold weather, and this provision will stop the transportation of all the tropical fruits from Central and South America unless some provision is made more than this six months' period.

The Government can not go out, except in war times, and confiscate property. It has no more right to come into my yard, if I am a packer, and take my refrigerator cars, except under the war powers that do not now exist, than it has to come upon a farm in South Dakota and take the team of horses that I use in the transportation of my produce to the market. That power does not exist, Mr. President; but still, in six months, unless the President or some other authority in this country can take 40,000 or more refrigerator cars away from their owners and devote them to the transportation of these particular kinds of merchandise, it will utterly stop the transportation.

I have no objection, under proper arrangements, to some provision of this kind being made when the transition can be effected without literally killing the fresh-meat trade and the trade in all the southern fruits that are brought into the market.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to ask the Senator a question. I agree with the Senator that the Government can not take away these refrigerator cars from the packing houses and others without paying for them. The Senator will recall, however, that so far we have only appropriated in this bill $500,000,000; and that is such an insignificant sum, and the people of the United States are so anxious to have us appropriate larger sums, that I will ask the Senator whether he does not think that a little, simple amendment by which, say, five hundred millions or a thousand millions may be added to the bill, so that we can buy from the packers these refrigerator cars, could be put through?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly. A man who never had a million dollars or a hundred thousand dollars can trip it lightly on his tongue. We have been talking of billions here until a mere paltry half billion dollars appears to be a bagatelle that would make a kindergarten smile. Why, certainly. Let me ask my beloved friend, however, how in time of peace you will take away from private property owners their refrigerator cars even if you have a half billion dollars?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Illinois entirely; but we have, as it appears to me, been so profligate with the people's money—we just appropriated in this bill last night, by amendment, $500,000,000 for a revolving fund for general purposes—that it seems to me, with a good case such as the Senator has, that it would be a fine time to offer another amendment and have us appropriate another half billion dollars in this bill to buy refrigerator cars that belong to somebody else, because they ought to be paid for—we all recognize that—if we take them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The $500,000,000 revolving fund is no creation of mine. I did not vote for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Neither did I, Mr. President. The Senator can not "shake his gory locks" at me.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not a revolving fund; it is a vanishing fund. [Laughter].

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept the Senator's statement about it, and agree with him entirely. It is vanishing, and will be very rapidly vanishing as soon as we appropriate it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, certainly. It will go the way of all other revolving funds.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator please tell the Senate the difference between a revolving fund and a vanishing fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a mere difference in nomenclature. In substance, there is no difference whatever. It is like loans to friends; not one dollar ever sees the original owner. To quote from Shakespeare—

> Neither a borrower nor a lender be:
> For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
> And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.

We have been loaning prodigally of the taxpayers' money, if you will permit the hackneyed expression, until we have lost sight of the fact that we may some time reach some limit. This $500,000,000 revolving fund may not revolve with sufficient rapidity to exhaust itself before refrigerator cars could be furnished; but if it goes the way of its predecessors, it will not be seen in time to supply a line of refrigerator cars adequate to the service.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I offered this amendment not feeling for a minute that it was going to arouse such intense opposition. The chairman of the committee is very anxious to go on with the consideration of the bill, and if the amendment is going to excite much further discussion I think I will withdraw it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I will support an amendment in this body along the lines of the amendment offered under adequate safeguards that will not disturb the fruit trade both within our own limits and the imported fruit coming by the United Fruit Co.'s boats, or disturb the distribution of fresh meats by the proper and gradual acquisition under proper powers of all the refrigerator car lines now in private hands.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has been talking very interestingly upon this subject. I have some slight knowledge of it but not the detailed knowledge that the Senator from Illinois has. I realized very fully that there is not a sufficient supply of refrigerator cars, at least during a portion of the year, and my thought was that the railroad companies should aim to furnish cars for the accommodation of the public. It is a perfectly legitimate proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I felt that by offering the amendment I was helping out the situation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator has not properly appreciated the scope of the amendment applied to actual conditions. I have lived through this for more than 25 years.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, for the time being, if the Senator will permit me, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be very glad to yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I object. I think it ought to be voted on. I have letters from Tennessee saying it is very necessary that there should be a provision in this bill providing that the railroads should control refrigerator cars. I think they should. If they have turned this business over to other corporations, I think it should be recovered in their interest. Of course, I was joking entirely when I suggested to the Senator a while ago that we appropriate money for it at this time. I do not think that is necessary. But I do not see any reason why it can not be worked out under the very excellent amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and I do not think he ought to withdraw that amendment after having offered it. I ask for a vote on it. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offered the amendment to the amendment, and expressed myself as in hearty accord with the purpose and object of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. At that time I only had an opportunity of gathering, in a very hurried way, the purpose and object of the amendment. But I have read over the amendment carefully, and I am a little apprehensive, Mr. President, that the amendment does not accomplish the object and purpose for which it was introduced. For that reason I hope that the Senator from Tennessee will not object to the withdrawal in order that it may be perfected.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to have it perfected. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. POMERENE. I stated a moment ago that I would withdraw the amendment now, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] so understood me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Ohio has that right.

Mr. POMERENE. I think I have that right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But inasmuch as an amendment to the amendment was offered, the Chair felt that unanimous consent was required.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That being withdrawn, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I offered an amendment to section 34, to strike out those paragraphs of section 34 referring the power proposed to be given to the board of transportation to determine wherein new railroads shall be built.

As I stated yesterday, we have given the transportation board the right to supervise the capital invested, the securities that may from time to time be issued on the investment, and to guarantee the public against any of the evil practices that heretofore have been in vogue, and I maintain that the condition of the country is not yet sufficiently standardized, nor is there a sufficient appreciation of the needs of the different communities by the public at large, to warrant us in lodging in a Federal transportation board the destiny of this country as to its enlarged transportation facilities.

I had a conversation with a member of this body from the West, who informed me that this was on a parallel with laws that we have now in reference to the development of the mining interests in the West. He informed me that previous to the passage of those laws great productive mines had been discovered and opened, but since the passage of the laws, which gave a Federal board the right to determine where and when prospectors should enter the field and locate a mine, there had been an absolute arrest of anything like the mineral development of this country.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have not heard the Senator's amendment. Is it in reference to building lines in communities where a road may be needed, or where the community may think it is needed?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes. I am taking the position, Mr. President, that the people in the communities, especially in the undeveloped sections of our country, are better judges of the necessities for facilities of transportation than a Federal political board, composed, as it is proposed to create this board, of three from one political party and two from another, into whose hands shall be placed the future railroad development of this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wanted to ask the Senator, as he is a member of the committee, if the bill does not put it exclusively in the hands of this board; and is it not, in effect at least, a prohibition against any State corporation building a railroad in any State of the Union, whether for interstate commerce or intrastate commerce?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not know that the bill refers specifically to it, but I think it is included under the general legislation, that all laws of the States to the contrary notwithstanding, the findings of this board shall be final.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in other words, as I understand the Senator, however much it might be desired to build a railroad through, for instance, the northern tier of counties in my State, where there is no railroad, and where one is so greatly desired, a corporation can not be formed in Tennessee for the building of that railroad at all. Although the citizens of those several counties might desire to raise the money and build a railroad they can not do it, and the only way in which it can be done would be to get this board to agree to some other company building a railroad there. Is that correct or not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The bill provides that before that company can build a road, or the citizens can build a road, they must appear before this board and state the reasons for building the road, the necessity for it; and they must get a permit from this board; and after the board has canvassed it and found that, in its judgment, it is for the general public interest, then it may or may not grant the permit.

Mr. McKELLAR. If there are 35 corporations already organized under the act, is it not an absolute impossibility, under the act, to organize a separate corporation; and must it not necessarily be one of the 35 already organized, because the act confines the organization of railroad companies in this country to 35 giant corporations?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator is correct in the inference. The bill provides that after the termination of seven years the country shall be divided into not less then 20 nor more than 35 corporations for the railway transportation business of this country. I do not know whether such a thing as is contemplated in this bill will ever be possible; I have my serious doubts as to whether they can by any process whatever compel the corporations of this country to unite in that number of corporations, or in any that is contrary to the voluntary desires of the parties in interest. But be that as it may, the contemplation of this bill is that the country shall be divided into the maximum and minimum indicated in the bill. Suppose that could be achieved. Then the country would be divided up into not more than 35 nor less than 20 monopolies, so far as the territory contiguous to their consolidations was concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. And all under the control of this political body of five, three of one party and two of the other party, and of course changeable whenever parties changed in this country. Is not that true?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Tennessee knows that is not in this bill. He knows very well, in the first place, that the bill contains a provision that new construction, not included in one of these systems, can be undertaken, and he knows very well that the board of transportation is appointed for a term of years, not removable at the pleasure of the President or any political administration. It is no more a political board than the Interstate Commerce Commission is a political board. I am quite content, of course, with legitimate criticism, but I have grown rather weary of criticisms for which there is no foundation whatever.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state that the board provided for in the bill is similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission and other commissions whose personnel have rotation in their appointments, so that a majority is always on the board. They are to be appointed at specified times, like the Interstate Commerce Commission. But no matter what their tenure of office may be, there are excellent purposes prescribed in this bill which they are to fulfill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not think that what I have just said refers to anything that he mentioned as being in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from South Carolina is presenting a perfectly legitimate proposition. There is a difference of opinion as to whether the building of railways should be subject to public control or not, and I am very happy to hear the position of the Senator from South Carolina. I was referring to what I regard as the utterly baseless assertions made with regard to the bill by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me just to reply to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I made the statement that this was a political board and I intend to prove it by the Senator's own bill, on page 22, where it says:

> Not more than three members of the board shall be appointed from the same political party.

It makes it a political board. Of course it is a political board and when the parties change it is going to be subject to change. The appointments are made on political lines because the bill provides that they shall be made on political lines. More than that, it prohibits the members of the board from being appointed on any other lines than political lines.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. It is idle to talk about it not being a political board when the very terms of the bill provide that it shall be that, and it can not be anything else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if the Interstate Commerce Commission is a political board? It is appointed in the same way.

Mr. McKELLAR. In a sense it is.

Mr. KELLOGG. What kind of a sense?

Mr. McKELLAR. In this sense only——

Mr. KELLOGG. The same sense the Senator has been talking about.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it is not at all. It is an entirely different situation with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not remember exactly the terms of the Interstate Commerce act, but they are not of this kind.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suggest that the Senator read it before he talks about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am talking about the pending bill. I say that this bill, the Senator from Iowa to the contrary notwithstanding, so provides, and it is absolutely true under the terms of his own bill, and a 5-year-old child that had good sense could see it. I am quoting from the bill—

Not more than three members of the board shall be appointed from the same political party.

It is a political board.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not care to have a discussion as to this particular feature of the bill. What I am intending to impress upon the Senate is whether in their judgment we have arrived at that degree of standardization in our railroad facilities and in the tonnage in the different parts of the country that we can pick and choose as to the very best method of reaching an already produced tonnage and carrying it to the market, or whether we are not still in that stage of development where the railroad proposed to be built will be a developer which for a period of years perhaps will have to help develop the territory. The territory through which it goes will be dependent upon the presence of that modern means of transportation.

I think, as the chairman of the committee has very well said, that it is a question for us to decide now. I do not doubt that the time will come in the history of the country when our development shall have reached that stage where it perhaps will be an imperative necessity to have some official board that will regulate the building of lines of railroads, because the temptation will always be present to try to get that form of investment for the purpose of making the public pay the toll.

But the question before us now is which do we believe will give us that which we all desire—more railroad facilities, a distribution of the means of transportation that will open up country now that is not contributing to the general wealth of the public? There are vast sections in the West, there are sections of the South, whose wealth is waiting on adequate means of transportation.

It does two things. It not only grants a means of transportation for that which is already in a form to be transported, but it becomes the promoter of the things to be transported. I think the history of governmental boards will show that we have not had sufficient development to justify them in controlling the output. I am convinced that the community on the ground, who understand intimately, who realize—not know, for there is a vast difference between a realization and a mere knowledge—who realize the necessities of the community, are the better judges of where the lines of transportation should be located than a mere official board who have nothing but a general knowledge of the general situation.

I hope we will realize that this is but an experiment if we do not make provision in the bill, for, as I understand it, if this is retained in the bill there is no chance of any modification thereof in conference, because, as I understand—I do not just now recall—there is a similar provision in the House bill.

I have discussed the question dispassionately upon the economic view that I take of it that we should allow the communities the right to determine where the roads should be put, where to build their roads, because at this stage, as I said a moment ago, in the provisions of the bill that take care of the investment and provide a Federal board to see that the money is used for the purpose for which the charter or franchise is issued, that there shall be no watered stock, that there shall be no inflation of value beyond the actual value, and restrict the new road to legitimate purposes for which it was incorporated, we have gone just as far in the stage of our development as is justifiable.

I hope that the Senate will strike the provision from the bill. I offer as an amendment to strike out that portion of section 34.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 73, beginning with line 14, strike out all down to and including the word "court," in line 12, on page 75.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the proposed amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST responded to his name.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have just a word to say. If this scheme or plan of——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The calling of the roll was started, and the first name was called and responded to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Chair overrule the point of order? Is not that a positive rule of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair——

Mr. BANKHEAD. The present occupant of the chair voted when his name was called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is true. Under the rules the Chair is bound to enforce that rule.

Mr. KING and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to know, when a Senator is on his feet asking for recognition, whether the Presiding Officer, who happens to be the first on the roll call, can defeat recognition by answering to his name in that way?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer has not sought to do that, but the rule has been invoked——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I make an observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I was looking at the Senator from Wisconsin and know he rose and addressed the Chair before the Secretary started to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the roll call being suspended? There being none the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if this scheme is sought to be retained in the bill, it is absolutely necessary that the section which is sought to be stricken out shall be retained.

It will be remembered that under this scheme of group rates there must be rates permitted or imposed that will pay 6 per cent return, or 5½ and possibly 6 per cent, upon the entire value of the property within the group. A new railroad in 99 cases out of 100 during the first years of its operation will not pay interest return, and unless the board of transportation is to have the power to say where new roads shall be built or extensions made, and if railroads are to be permitted without that permission to be constructed and the board is compelled in fixing the group rates to allow 6 per cent upon the value of the railroad property within the group, does not every Senator see that every new railroad constructed will increase the rates for every shipper upon every line of railroad within that group?

It is very plain that unless there is this restriction, there will be an increase of rates upon all the railroads within the group. Without this provision, of course, the railroad would take its chances.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That means, according to the Senator's argument—and I overlooked the point he is making, because I wanted to make some remarks about it myself—that no new railroads will be built after this grouping feature has gone into effect, except they are built where the tonnage on them will relieve the country of any additional taxation for new transportation?

Mr. LENROOT. Either that or in a case where, in the opinion of the transportation board, there will be sufficient business developed in the immediate future to make it a paying proposition.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator has sustained exactly the argument that I was making, that in some undeveloped territory, of which there is still an abundance in the country, there will be no further railroad construction unless the conditions in the community are such as to warrant at least the 5½ per cent.

It was in my mind to say that if this provision were stricken out there could be an amendment to the bill providing for the taking care of the new railroads and not include them in the 5½ per cent rate. I think communities would be willing for a term of years to absorb the overhead charges and the incidental construction expenses incurred in the process of their development. Every railroad built in this country through undeveloped territory has been built not so much with the hope of return in the form of dividends and earnings of the road as from the enhanced value of the property through which the road runs and because of the facilities afforded the people.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not quite agree with the Senator from South Carolina in that statement. I think, as a matter of fact, the great bulk of the railroads have been built in this country for the reason that those who were responsible for their construction and who constructed them were able to make a very large amount of money out of the construction.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, there may have been some such cases; but he knows that the construction of the great transcontinental lines which connect the East and the West, which built up that trackless prairie wilderness, certainly did not offer any hope of reward, but the construction of those roads did offer the hope of the development of this magnificent continent, and that hope was realized.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but the fact remains that under this plan those who receive no benefit from the new construction will be compelled to pay such rates as will, including the value of the new construction, afford at least a 5½ per cent return.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to ask the Senator a question. I said a moment ago that I hoped that a provision might be made at least whereby a community desiring to secure railroad facilities might be compelled to sustain a part at least of the rate, sufficient, at all events, to justify their desire for it. However, does not the Senator believe that the development of the resources of this country is a matter of concern to the whole people? Does he not believe that furnishing the undeveloped sections of this country with adequate transportation facilities to bring about such development is certainly a matter of sufficient concern for us to waive the mere fact that the general public may pay some of the expense? They would not pay all of it, for there would certainly be some return from the beginning; but in case there was not, could we not provide in the bill that, where such construction is undertaken and completed, for a period of years freight originating on that line shall pay a certain rate in excess of the rate paid on freight which does not originate on the line and let the community absorb the excess because of the benefit derived by them? That would seem to me to be a comparatively simple matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, that is true in so far as new construction is built which is in no sense competitive with any existing construction; but in a case where the new line is competitive the suggestion which the Senator makes is an impossibility.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the Senator from Wisconsin seems to overlook the fact that we have no further competition in rates; it is restricted to competition in service; and the Senator wants competition in service. But there is no competition in rates.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator from South Carolina just suggested that upon the new line higher rates might be imposed than were imposed on the old competitive line; and that, I say, is an impossibility.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I said to the Senator, as he was claiming that we would have to provide for a return of five and a half per cent on the investment value, if we had to provide for that why not put a charge upon the road, increase the rate on the freight where the freight originated, so that road would pay five and a half per cent?

Mr. LENROOT. If it was competitive, and if the rates were higher than upon the old competing road, that road would not carry any freight.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If it was built through an undeveloped country, it would have no competition; and these are the very places where we need railroad construction above all things.

Mr. LENROOT. I said in the beginning that the Senator's theory would be correct if there were no competition upon the newly constructed road.

But, Mr. President, just a word further upon the merits of the proposition of control over railroad construction. In so far as new competitive roads are concerned, it is the wisest economy to have control over such construction, because if there is a line of road that can do the business for an entire territory and another line is put into competition with it, the freight charges for everybody in that region will have been increased because two lines of railroad divide the business that would naturally go to one; and the two, therefore, can not make the same net earnings that one line of road would make. As the Senator from Iowa has said, a very large number of States in the Union have passed laws providing that before a new railroad can be constructed a certificate of necessity must be secured from their State utility boards. That is in the interest of the public.

So far as new construction is concerned, I do not believe, to be frank with the Senator, that we are going to have any great amount of new construction, even though there were no restrictions in this bill, because the day of new construction when the promoters issued a dollar's worth of stock with a dollar's worth of bonds and then sold the bonds for 90 cents has gone by; such a thing is not going to be permitted any more. I believe that we will have to come to this proposition as to new construction of railroads; that the Government itself will have in some way to lend its own credit for the new construction, taking the securities and trusting to the future, after the region has been built up and the traffic developed, to secure its return.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am quite sure that the majority of the Senators on this floor hope that the day will never come when the necessities of the case, the inordinate greed of men, will force the Government to assume Government ownership to protect the people from themselves.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not suggest Government ownership.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, the Senator said the Government would have to provide the means for railroad construction, and whenever the time shall come that the Government of the United States has got to furnish the money to secure these railroads, that day the Government will own the railroads.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator know that $500,000,000 is provided in this bill now for that very purpose?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And the Senator from Wisconsin knows that the Senator from South Carolina voted against that amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. So did the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Precisely. Now, Mr. President, we are coming back at last to the question of whether the necessity of which the Senator from Wisconsin spoke a moment ago as to the construction of new lines shall be left to the various communities, to the States, or to the Federal Government. The Senator said there were laws in some States now providing that the public-service commission shall pass upon the necessity of a proposed road. That is all right so far as a sovereign State is concerned which is in intimate relation with its own people. That is one of the relics of the genius of this Government, as expressed in its dual form.

I know that, so far as State rights are concerned and State lines are concerned, under modern conditions they have all gone; so far as any constitutional limitation between the power of the one and the power of the other is concerned, as rapidly as we have been able to do so we have taken them out and centralized them here in Washington. We are doing it every day. In order to cure one evil we are embracing the other evil of a centralized form of government, so that the Senator's State of Wisconsin will be at the will and behest of a majority of the people who may not know the local conditions and have no way of justly controlling and governing the situation. The pride of our country has been the fact that, stretching from the Arctic regions clear to the Tropics, differing geographically, as the products of our forest, field, and mine differ, our own local affairs can be taken care of by the people living in the respective communities; but we have repudiated that doctrine now and come to the point where we run to Washington to find out what is a panacea for a sore foot. We have gone so far as to say that the Federal Government shall take the place of mother and father and determine whether a child of a certain age shall go to school or shall stay at home; we have invaded the sacred precincts of nearly every relation of life merely in order to bring to Washington the centralized and paternalistic tendencies of the age. God knows, if there is to be left any relic of our Government in its splendid dual form, local self-government, spelling democracy, as it does, it is time some of us should now stand in the breach and, if possible, stem the tide that has set to the destruction of our form of government.

This is but one of the symptoms of the disease that is sapping the very foundation of our democracy and making the very thing that the chairman of the committee has labored in the committee room to protect—to protect what? The American people from the American people.

Look where we have arrived with our splendid liberty, with the sovereignty of the individual, with the doctrine preached that each man has the right to pursue life, liberty, and happiness! We are now here solemnly attempting to enact a law by which American business can be saved from organized American workingmen, and we solemnly endeavor to put upon the statute books a law that will make them criminals because of an exaggerated exercise of what they consider to be their sovereign right. We have invaded every precinct of local self-government and placed the desecrating hand of a centralized form of government upon it until we no longer live in the America that our fathers fought for and established. We have been driven from one position to another not by the cold philosophy that laid the foundations of our form of Government, but by political expediency.

The country was so new, so undeveloped, that men busy in making wealth for themselves considered that the Government could run itself. They were not face to face with the crises that are now confronting us. Had we been forced to pass through the crucible that molded the Washingtons and the Jeffersons and the Madisons the evils that now are upon us would not be here. When men love right, when men love their Government better than they love to warm these leather seats, this country will be safe; but so long as the citadel of our democracy and our form of Government are left in the hands of those who quake at the threat of those who they are afraid will tip the balance and remove them from this arena, the country is not safe. I want to stand here and now in these closing hours, perhaps, before the Christmas holidays, and register my protest against any further encroachment upon the sovereign right of States and communities to control their own affairs.

The Senate must not forget that railroad transportation is not yet owned by the public. Private capital is still furnishing the sinews of war to carry it on. Until it shall have passed from out of the realm of being partial private and partial public, I declare that the local communities are best able to determine what is best for their local conditions, and should be allowed the privilege of furnishing themselves with this indispensable means of transportation, and not relegate it, as we are relegating everything on the face of God's earth, from the fireside to the counting room, to Washington for adjudication, control, and determination.

There is precious little left now. I do not know whether anything is left or not. A man who used to feel safe under the police powers of his State does not know now whether he is under the Federal Government in a particular case or whether he is under his own State. Whenever it shall transpire that the power of the State is dissipated forever and we are centralized in Washington, this country is doomed. The spirit that made this a dual form of Government is not dead. It has faith in us. Though it may not understand what we do, it trusts us; but when it awakens to the fact that we have sold its birthright for a miserable seat in this body it will send men here who will restore the right of local self-government under the terms of our Constitution.

Mr. President, every time anything is mentioned about the development of any part of the country we immediately ask the question, "What will Washington—Congress—say about it?" No more liberty of action; no more local judgment. I think we may pause. I think now is the time for us to accept the simple proposition that I make, yielding to you to the extent of saying: "Have Federal control over the securities and guarantee the people that their money shall not be dissipated in watered stock and overcapitalization and speculation, but leave to the people who are to be benefited or not by the presence or absence of this means of transportation the decision as to whether they shall have it or whether they shall not have it."

It is a little task. It is a lot to grant that you shall have supervision of our securities. If it were not for the fact that in interstate commerce the tariffs must be more or less uniform it would not be justifiable to interfere at all.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that on this proposed amendment the little modicum left to develop the undeveloped territory of the United States shall not be shackled, hindered, and restricted by having to pay men's expenses to come all the way to Washington, take off their hats, and bow their knees to a board of five to know whether or not a rich and a productive section shall be opened up by this means of transportation; and if the board are so minded they say "yes"; if they are not, they say "no."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a few moments ago I was severely taken to task by the chairman of the committee, who walks out of the Chamber as I rise to reply, about some statements I made about this bill. I think the chairman ought to study his own bill before he makes statements of that kind about another Senator who has asked a question about it.

I made the statement, Mr. President, that there was no provision in this bill for new construction; that it was not adequately taken care of; that there was a prohibition against the organization of corporations in any State to build new lines of railroad, however necessary they may be. I want to read from the bill to show that my statement was absolutely accurate.

SEC. 10. Immediately after its organization as aforesaid, the board shall prepare and adopt a plan for the consolidation of the railway properties of the United States into not less than 20 nor more than 35 systems, according to the policy declared in the last preceding section.

It provides that if they are not so organized within seven years they shall be consolidated by the Government, by the transportation board; and here are the provisions for new construction. This is in the original bill. Now, listen to this. This is on page 25 of the reprint:

The said board shall carefully and continuously make inquiry respecting the transportation needs and facilities of the whole country, and of each transportation situation as it may arise, the adequacy and efficiency of such transportation facilities and service, and when and how they should be enlarged or improved.

It shall inquire into the state of the credit of all such common carriers subject to the said act to regulate commerce, as amended, and inform itself of the relation between the operating revenues, the operating income, and the net operating income of such carriers.

It shall inquire as to the new capital which the public interest may require the carriers or any carrier to secure in order that adequate and efficient transportation service and facilities may at all times be provided, and into the conditions under which said new capital may be secured. From time to time it shall certify to the commission its findings in these respects, and the commission shall accept such certificate or certificates as prima facie evidence in any hearing upon the matters to which such certificate or certificates respectively relate.

Is there any provision there for new construction? Does "inquiry" mean a provision for new construction? Remember that the provisions of this bill prohibit any other than 35 corporations, at the most, from being organized. After that prohibition, of course, State corporations can not be organized; and I want to call the attention of the Senate to the conditions in a part of my State where railroad facilities should be furnished in the future. They can not be furnished under this bill, nor, indeed, can they be furnished under the very mild amendment offered by the Senator from Montana and adopted—not in the original bill, but adopted afterwards, on page 19 of the bill. It is impossible for such a situation as I shall speak of now to be taken care of.

There are millions of tons of coal yet in middle Tennessee, near the Kentucky line, all along the Kentucky border in northern Tennessee. There is no railroad line in that part of our State. In order that the Nation may have the advantage of those immense coal beds, it is absolutely necessary that railroad lines shall be built. They can not be built by local enterprise. They can not be built by the States. They can not be built by the counties. They can not be built by private enterprise at all. They can not even get an organization for it under this bill. They may have the money, they may have the coal, they may have the other necessaries, but under this bill they are absolutely prohibited from organizing a corporation; and, as the Senator from Wisconsin well said, it can not be done under this system, because if you organize a new railroad, or if you permit one of the existing organizations to build an addition to its lines, it can not possibly pay for it. It has to be aided in some way.

Now, how is it going to be aided? How is it going to add to its line? This bill contemplates leaving the present lines there. It does not provide for new construction. It does not contemplate new construction, except such incidental construction as may be necessary in connection with those lines. It is an embargo on new construction, and for that reason if for no other the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] should be adopted. It is not a right thing, it is not a patriotic thing to do, to bottle up and put a fence around the resources of this country, because we all know that without railroad transportation the resources in our mountains can not be brought to the public and put in commerce.

Mr. President, it may be said that under the mild amendment of the Senator from Montana, found on page 19, this might be done. Look at the state of that situation. His amendment is as follows:

Provided, however, That any railroad corporation proposing to undertake any work of new construction—

That is, one of the 35—

may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to retain for a period not to exceed 10 years all or any part of its earnings from such new construction in excess of the amount heretofore in this section provided for such disposition as it may care to make of the same; and the said commission may, in its discretion, grant such permission, conditioned, however, upon the completion of the work of construction within a period to be designated by the commission in its order granting such permission.

That will not provide for the situation to which I have referred. It will not provide for the situation that we know exists in at least three-fourths of the States. Talk about railroad construction being stopped in this country! Of course, it has not stopped. It has hardly begun. When we talk about railroad construction being stopped in this country, it is like Mr. Webster, some 70 or 80 years ago, saying that all of that part of our country west of Mississippi was a barren waste, not fit for civilization, and that he would not vote for an appropriation for any purpose to be expended west of the Mississippi River. Why, railroad construction is certainly not stopped, but only fairly begun. We may stop it for a while by a bill like this, but the American people are not going to permit this bill or any other law to stop railroad construction, because it will be repealed. If we are foolish enough to enact this provision into law, a subsequent Congress will unquestionably change the law so that the resources of this country may not be bottled up by lack of new construction.

One other matter, Mr. President: As I said before, not only are State corporations prevented from entering upon new construction, but there can not be any opposition at all. The Federal Government assumes it all. It is contrary to every policy of government that we have in this country. We will have to come to Washington, with our hats in our hands, asking this political board to grant the right to construct a railway in some part of Nebraska or Montana. You can not get it constructed in any other way. Your people in Nebraska or Montana, which I use by way of illustration, may be the most enterprising people in the world, and yet they can not organize a railroad corporation and build a railroad, because it is prohibited under this bill. I do not believe it is defensible for a moment, and I insist that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina should be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate this evening, I desire to offer an amendment, and I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table so that it may be called up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. HENDERSON to the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, viz: On page 77, line 11, strike out all of lines 11 to and including line 17, page 78, and insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through route than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the Interstate Commerce Commission such common carrier may in special cases, not due to or arising out of conditions of water competition, actual or potential, direct or indirect, after investigation, be authorized by the commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section: Provided further, That no authorization for a change of existing rates under the proviso of this section shall be granted within six months from the approval of this act, nor in any case where application shall have been filed before the commission, in accordance with the provisions of this section, until a determination of such application by the commission; but in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not fairly compensatory for the service performed."

Mr. HARRISON. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WATSON. I offer an amendment to the pending railroad bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 18, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Jehovah, Father of all souls, infinite in all Thine attributes, impart unto us plenteously of these inestimable gifts, that we may know Thee better, conform our ways to Thy ways, and walk humbly with Thee.

Speak to us, we beseech Thee, through the still, small voice, that we may live our convictions, privately and publicly, and thus hallow Thy name after the similitude of Him who spake as man never spake and lived supremely glorious in Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 11125) increasing the salary of the United States marshal of the eastern district of Virginia was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Evidently that was an inadvertent reference, and I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated be rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—EXPENSES OF THE SECOND INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of Labor making an estimate of appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of defraying the salaries and expenses of the second industrial conference called to meet in Washington December 1, 1919. I heartily approve this estimate and urgently request that the appropriation be made at the earliest possible moment.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD (H. DOC. NO. 533).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information and consideration of the Congress a report from Bernard M. Baruch, chairman of the United States War Industries Board, of the activities of said board during the war.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESIGNATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 17, 1919.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
The Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have this day transmitted to the secretary of state of New York my resignation as a Representative in Congress of the United States from the tenth district of New York, to take effect December 31, 1919.

Faithfully yours, REUBEN L. HASKELL, Tenth District, New York.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for permission to address the House on January 8 next for 20 minutes. The battle field upon which the Battle of New Orleans is located is in my district immediately below where I was born, and I would like to have 20 minutes on January 8, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk, in which to address the House on that subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that on January 8, the anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans, he be allowed to address the House for 20 minutes on that subject. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a copy of the resolutions adopted at the First National Convention of the American Legion, held at Minneapolis, Minn., November 10, 11, and 12, 1919.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein resolutions adopted at the meeting of the American Legion. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the subject of the resolutions?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio they are simply resolutions concerning legislation adopted by the legion.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the trouble about that is this, that the legions in various States are passing resolutions concerning legislation. If the RECORD is going to be used for the purpose of printing resolutions adopted by the various State legions or their subordinate bodies, why the RECORD is going to be encumbered considerably with such resolutions, and therefore some policy of Congress in reference to the matter——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman I do not believe the RECORD ought to be encumbered by resolutions of the different States, but these are purely resolutions from the national convention, and I know of no——

Mr. GARNER. Oh, I understood this was from Ohio. I understand now these are resolutions of the national convention.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. These are resolutions adopted by the national convention.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 14.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee be, and is hereby, created, consisting of three Members of the United States Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, respectively, to make a survey of and report on those activities of the several departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies of the Government of the United States which relate to the protection and promotion of the public health, sanitation, care of the sick and injured, and the collection and dissemination of information relating thereto.

SEC. 2. That such committee is directed and empowered to report to the Congress not later than March 1, 1920—

(a) The statutory powers and duties conferred by the Congress on any department, division, bureau, office, or agency of the United States Government to carry on any work pertaining to the conservation and improvement of the public health, together with any rules and regulations authorized or promulgated thereunder;

(b) The organizations now existing in the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying out these powers and duties, together with the personnel of, appropriations for, and expenditures by each department, division, bureau, office, and agency during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919;

(c) The coordination now existing between said departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies, together with any conflicts, overlapping, or duplication of powers, duties, functions, organizations, and activities;

(d) The cooperation and coordination now existing between the Government of the United States and the government of the several States or extragovernmental agencies for the conservation or improvement of the public health;

(e) Such further information as such committee may deem proper;

(f) Such recommendations as such committee may deem advisable to offer for the improvement of the public health work of the United States Government.

SEC. 3. That such committee be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts, deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before such committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; the expenses involved in carrying out the provisions of this resolution, one half to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the other half out of the contingent fund of the House; and that such committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Congress.

Senate concurrent resolution 22.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enroll the bill (S. 2472) to amend an act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as follows:

Insert the matter proposed by the House amendment No. 15, and after "herein," on page 5, line 8, of the engrossed bill, insert "nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prohibit the Federal Reserve Board, under its power to prescribe rules and regulations, from limiting the aggregate amount of liabilities of any or all classes incurred by the corporation and outstanding at any one time."

On page 5, line 24, of the engrossed bill, strike out the word "not."

On page 5, line 25, of the engrossed bill, after "transacting," insert the word "any."

On page 5, line 25, of the engrossed bill, after "United States," strike out the comma.

On page 6, line 5, of the engrossed bill, restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 21 and insert the matter proposed by said amendment.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 14.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee be, and is hereby, created, consisting of three Members of the United States Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, respectively, to make a survey of and report on those activities of the several departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies of the Government of the United States which relate to the protection and promotion of the public health, sanitation, care of the sick and injured, and the collection and dissemination of information relating thereto.

SEC. 2. That such committee is directed and empowered to report to the Congress not later than March 1, 1920—

(a) The statutory powers and duties conferred by the Congress on any department, division, bureau, office, or agency of the United States Government to carry on any work pertaining to the conservation and improvement of the public health, together with any rules and regulations authorized or promulgated thereunder;

(b) The organizations now existing in the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying out these powers and duties, together with the personnel of, appropriations for, and expenditures by each department, division, bureau, office, and agency during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919;

(c) The coordination now existing between said departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies, together with any conflicts, overlapping, or duplication of powers, duties, functions, organizations, and activities;

(d) The cooperation and coordination now existing between the Government of the United States and the government of the several States or extragovernmental agencies for the conservation or improvement of the public health;

(e) Such further information as such committee may deem proper;

(f) Such recommendations as such committee may deem advisable to offer for the improvement of the public-health work of the United States Government.

SEC. 3. That such committee be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts, deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before such committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; the expenses involved in carrying out the provisions of this resolution, one half to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and the other half out of the contingent fund of the House; and that such committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Congress—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on Monday, January 5.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House on January 5. Is there objection?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject does the general propose to address the House?

Mr. SHERWOOD. On the Irish question. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House on the Irish question for 20 minutes on Monday, January 5. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DIRECTING THE ATTORNEY GENERAL TO SUBMIT CERTAIN INFORMATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution 394.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 394.

Resolved, That the Attorney General is hereby requested to report to the House of Representatives forthwith—

(1) Upon what authority of law he has fixed the price of Louisiana sugar on the plantation at the price of 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated.

(2) Whether it is usual for the office of the Attorney General to interpret in advance of legal action the United States criminal statutes, and notify possible violators of the criminal statutes whom he will prosecute and whom he will not prosecute.

(3) The facts upon which he fixed the maximum price of 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated.

(4) How sugar at retail can be identified either by the seller or the buyer as Louisiana sugar so as to prevent a general rise of the retail price of sugar well in advance of a 17 and 18 cent production base.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

On page 1, line 1, strike out the word "requested" and insert in lieu thereof the word "directed."

On page 1, after line 3, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"(1) Whether he made, assented to, or approved in any way a price for Louisiana sugar on the plantation of 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated."

Page 1, line 8, strike out the figure "1" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "2."

Page 1, line 8, after the word "fixed," insert the words "or agreed that."

Page 1, line 9, after the word "plantation," strike out the words "at the price of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "should be."

Strike out lines 12 and 13, on page 1, and lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 2, and insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"(3) Whether it has been usual for the office of the Attorney General in advance of legal action to render an official opinion in relation to the United States criminal statutes and notify possible violators of his interpretation of them, and whether he notified Louisiana sugar producers that under laws against profiteering they would not be prosecuted if they sold yellow clarified at 17 cents per pound and plantation granulated at 18 cents per pound.

Page 2, line 12, strike out the figure "3" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "4."

In the same line, after the word "fixed," insert the words "or agreed upon."

Page 2, line 14, after the word "granulated," insert the words "and how these facts were obtained."

Page 2, line 16, strike out all of lines 16, 17, 18, and 19.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution, and I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I think there will be no objection if he asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, but I am not willing that it should be considered as a privileged resolution, because I do not think it is a privileged resolution.

Mr. TINKHAM. I will ask the honorable Representative from Tennessee why it is not a privileged resolution, in his opinion?

Mr. GARRETT. I will be very glad to give the opinion to the gentleman. On page 1, in the second paragraph, it asks upon what authority of law he has fixed or agreed that, and so forth. Of course, that calls for a legal opinion from the Attorney General of the United States. It does not call for any facts, and under the well-settled practice of the House any resolution calling for an opinion is not privileged. I will say to the gentleman there is no objection to it, so far as I am advised, and all I am asking is that he ask unanimous consent, so that this may not go through as a privileged resolution.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid discussion, I ask that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is recognized.

Mr. TINKHAM. The answers to these interrogatories by the Attorney General will disclose whether he has the legal authority to fix or agree to the fixing of a price for Louisiana sugar, as he has done, and upon what facts he has based his judgment, and whether laws recently given the Attorney General at his request to reduce the cost of living and to prosecute profiteers have been effectively and discreetly administered.

The report of the Committee on the Judiciary, in the last paragraph, says:

It has been represented to the committee and it is currently reported that the Attorney General has assented to and approved an agreement with the Louisiana sugar producers fixing a price of 17 cents a pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated sugar; that this agreement was made while sugar was usually sold upon the market from 11 to 12 cents per pound; and that sugar since then has risen rapidly in price. In view of this it seems important that Congress should know the facts called for in this resolution.

In part proof of this agreement and assent I offer to the House an Associated Press dispatch, published in all the Washington newspapers, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., November 8.

Seventeen cents for prime yellow clarified sugar and 18 cents for choice plantation granulated, the price set by Louisiana planters, was acceptable to Attorney General Palmer, according to a telegram received here late to-day by United States Attorney Henry Mooney.

I now desire to bring to the attention of the House a telegram which is purported to have been sent by the Attorney General to the United States attorney in New Orleans, which, in my view, is an extraordinary telegram:

Your wire 8th received detailing result of a conference. Consider agreed price rather high, but hereby concur in maximum price fixed of 17 cents for Louisiana plantation clarified and 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated, understanding that all contracts for higher figure to be abrogated. Further suggest that, if possible, you secure agreement in writing by authorized committee of Louisiana producers and refiners, to be used as prima facie evidence. Where prices are charged in excess of agreement you are hereby instructed to immediately prosecute any violation of this agreed price.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Who signed that telegram?

Mr. TINKHAM. It purports to have been signed by the Attorney General and is addressed to the United States attorney, in accordance with my best information. I desire to have the House carefully note the following words:

Consider agreed price rather high.

And the words:

Further suggest that, if possible, you secure agreement in writing by authorized committee of Louisiana producers and refiners, to be used as prima facie evidence.

And the last words of the telegram:

You are hereby instructed to immediately prosecute any violation of this agreed price.

Mr. MADDEN. Any violation of the agreed price?

Mr. TINKHAM. Any violation of the agreed price.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state what was the price of Cuban sugar at that time?

Mr. TINKHAM. It was somewhere between 6 and 7 cents, according to my best information.

To return to the last words of the telegram, "agreed price." With whom was the agreement made? If between the producers and the United States attorney as agent for the Attorney General, then the price was fixed by the Attorney General. If the agreement was made among the producers and then approved by the Attorney General to the United States attorney at New Orleans, it is only subterfuge to say that the price was not fixed by the Attorney General, and the Attorney General, as I shall show subsequently, had absolutely no authority or power to fix the price of any commodity, which includes sugar.

But the words in relation to the preparation of prima facie evidence are what made this telegram most extraordinary, because it is a suggestion by the Attorney General in relation to possible cases of profiteering that evidence in advance shall be arranged and prepared.

If 17 and 18 cents would allow a profit to the smaller plantations, the same price for the larger and richer plantations would allow much larger profits, and the suggestion that prima facie evidence be prepared would be a suggestion to prepare evidence so that the owners of the larger and richer plantations might be protected from prosecution. I am not saying at all that this was the intention, but it would be the effect.

If the price of 17 and 18 cents was only the average price which would let average producers make a profit but compel the small and less well managing producer to sell at a loss then the Attorney General's policy has deprived these producers of their rights to a reasonable profit.

There is no authority except under the food-control act to fix prices.

The only right to fix prices under this act is found in section 11, which gave authority to the Government to buy necessaries and of course to sell them at any fixed price.

Section 14 gave the President the right to guarantee the price of wheat and to buy wheat and sell it at a fixed price.

Section 25 gave the President the right to fix, under certain conditions, the price of coal and coke.

Section 27 gave the President the power to purchase nitrate of soda and to fix the price of same.

Section 5, which has been used to control the price of food, only gives the President power to license manufacturers and distributors of necessaries. This power was to be used only after issuance of a proclamation as to what was to be licensed and then no person could engage in the business except under Federal license. The President in this section was given power to prevent any unfair profit, so that in this way prices were or could be legally controlled. The amendment passed by this session of Congress to the food-control act gave no additional price-fixing power.

Therefore there is no power for the Attorney General to fix prices of sugar or to assent to any price for sugar which has any legal force.

Mr. Figg, Assistant Attorney General, has stated before a committee of the Senate that the Department of Justice has no right to fix prices or any other right over profiteers except to prosecute profiteers in individual cases.

Evidence will be found in the testimony, subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, given October 3, page 72, and is as follows:

Mr. MARTIN. In event of the Sugar Equalization Board not continuing in existence and continuing to control sugar, does the Department of Justice contemplate taking action under the food-control-act amendment now pending?

Mr. FIGG. The Department of Justice could not take action under that only in so far as individual cases of profiteering are concerned.

Mr. MARTIN. But in doing that you would have to fix a fair price?

Mr. FIGG. That would be purely a matter for the court. There would be no one in the Department of Justice to say what would be considered a fair profit.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Certainly.

Mr. SANFORD. And in this case it would be exclusively a question of fact in each case, would it not?

Mr. TINKHAM. It would be a question of fact, purely and simply, for the jury; and my contention is that the authority of the Attorney General does not go beyond the right to prosecute individuals for profiteering. It seems to me that in fixing the price of sugar or assenting to a price for sugar he is exceeding his legal authority and is superseding both the court and the authority of the jury.

Under an arbitrarily fixed price it well might be that large and very well managed plantations or businesses might make what would be extortionate profits—would be, in fact, profiteering; but under a ruling such as the Attorney General has made in Louisiana there would be immunity against any prosecution for thus profiteering—in other words, protecting the profiteer and not prosecuting him.

Under the third interrogatory I asked whether it had been usual for the office of the Attorney General in advance of legal action to render an official opinion in relation to United States criminal statutes and notify possible violators of his interpretation of them, and whether he notified the Louisiana sugar producers, and so forth. Under the Revised Statutes, Title VIII, sections 346 to 387, there are created and defined the duties of the Attorney General. Neither by this law nor any amendment to it is there given any authority to the Attorney General to give any advice or opinion except to the President and to the heads of departments and bureaus and their officers in the discharge of their respective duties. The Attorney General if asked for an opinion, even by a Member of Congress, replies with a formal and set answer. I will read that formal and set answer to you, because I happen to have received one within a month. I will read the letter which I received from the Attorney General. I think it will explain itself:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL
Washington, November 15, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The department has received your letter of the 13th instant asking for advice as to whether this department is prevented by the exemption of labor unions and growers' organizations contained in the Clayton Act and appropriation laws from taking action in the proposed movement by the American Cotton Association, a growers' organization, to retire 2,000,000 bales of cotton from the market in an effort to force a rise in prices.

I am precluded, for the reasons set forth in the inclosed statement, from giving advice except to the President and heads of the executive departments. It may be said, however, that the following provisions in the Clayton Act and sundry civil bill (the provisions to which you refer) speak for themselves:

"Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws." (Sec. 6.)

"No part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products." (Appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, 1920.)

Respectfully,

C. B. AMES,
Assistant to the Attorney General.

The inclosure reads as follows, and I assume it is sent to anyone who asks a question similar to the one which I propounded, namely, in relation to any interpretation of any law. I read:

The law prescribing the duties of the Attorney General does not permit him to give advice or official opinions to others than the President and the heads of the several executive departments of the United States. This principle, repeatedly declared by my predecessors, was, in 1878, well expressed by former Attorney General Devens, as follows:

"The authority of the Attorney General to render his official opinion is limited by the laws which create and define his office and does not permit him to give advice at the call of either House of Congress or of Congress itself, but only to the President or the head of an executive department of the Government. The absence of authority to respond to calls for legal opinions coming from sources other than those prescribed by law was early in the history of the Government suggested * * * by the then Attorney General, Mr. Wirt, * * * and no change in this respect has been made by the law creating the Department of Justice. The view thus taken has been invariably observed by my predecessors, including Attorneys General Taney, Crittenden, Bates, Evarts, and Williams." (15 Ops. A. G., 475, 476.)

The rule thus stated, as a rule of law, may also be regarded as a rule of necessity. So many are the requests coming to the department for advice on difficult legal questions that, were all to be properly examined into and answered, the efficiency of the department in the performance of its regular legal duties would be seriously affected.

I regret that for these reasons I can not comply with your request.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has it not been the uniform practice of the Attorney General to give opinions to United States attorneys throughout the country?

Mr. TINKHAM. I should not question his right to give his opinions and his directions to his agents and subordinates.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has not that been uniform practice since the foundation of the Government?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not question the right of the Attorney General to give his opinion to his United States attorneys or agents, but in this case the Attorney General gave to his agent in Louisiana his interpretation of the criminal statutes before legal action had been taken of any kind to be transmitted to possible violators. It was as if a certain set of men had come to the Attorney General and asked him his opinion if certain acts were legal or not and his advising these men what was legal and what was not. This, I understand, before legal action, has never been done, and is at least in spirit forbidden by statutes or opinions which his assistant has quoted to me in his communication.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not mean to divert the gentleman from his argument in that respect, but I did not wish it to go out unchallenged that the Attorney General of the United States had not uniformly given advice and directions to attorneys of the United States throughout the country.

Mr. TINKHAM. The Attorney General in this case was not merely giving instructions to his agent in Louisiana, the United States attorney, but was interpreting through him to a class of people affected by the criminal statutes his advice and opinion, as I have stated.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman contend that the Attorney General, who has direction of prosecutions under the statutes, is not permitted to say to the district attorneys or others when he will or when he will not prosecute under a certain state of facts?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Has it not been the custom, for instance, under the Sherman antitrust law, for the Attorney General to state that under certain conditions he will not prosecute or under certain conditions he will prosecute?

Mr. TINKHAM. I believe in those cases always actions had been brought. Here no action has been brought under the criminal statutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman consider it to be entirely improper for the Attorney General, having charge of prosecutions, to inform the public when he will not prosecute, thinking there is no violation of the law, and when he will prosecute, thinking there is a violation of the law, in order that the public may know probably whether they are violating or not violating a law by doing a certain thing?

Mr. TINKHAM. I know that the Attorney General has refused to give that advice upon my request in a formal letter, and I know that he inclosed this statement of the duties, obligations, and laws respecting his office.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not think that is quite the question. The question of giving advice to somebody is one thing. The question of announcing a determination on the part of the Attorney General on a certain state of facts is an entirely different thing.

Mr. TINKHAM. I would say to the honorable Representative from Illinois that when the Attorney General undertook to fix a price where he has no authority to fix that price under the law he is giving advice of a most detailed character and most exact character of the interpretation of criminal statutes, and in accordance with the communication from which I now may read he has no right to do that. If that is not an interpretation, an arbitrary interpretation, of a criminal statute as to profiteering, I do not know what is; and no action, I will state to the honorable Representative from Illinois, had been taken.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, if the gentleman will permit me further, the gentleman from Massachusetts and I think no one else would think it the duty of the Attorney General to prosecute everybody in the United States who made a sale of property—to prosecute for profiteering. Is not the Attorney General requiring some district attorneys to determine in the first instance as a question of fact whether in their opinion a certain thing is profiteering, and is there any harm, if the Attorney General reaches a conclusion, in announcing it to the public?

Mr. TINKHAM. In reply to the honorable Representative from Illinois I would say that it has not been usual, as I understand, heretofore, before legal action has been taken, for an interpretation to be made. If the United States attorney in the district considers a violation of law has occurred, then he takes his case to the jury, and the jury establishes the rule of reason in relation to that class of cases.

In fact, under the antitrust laws many organizations, as I understand it, have applied to the Attorney General's office for interpretations of the law and been refused. In this particular case we are discussing the Attorney General and his unequivocally advising a class of men, namely, Louisiana sugar producers, exactly what his interpretation of the profiteering statutes is. He has given his opinion to them through his agent. This, I believe, is without precedent and, so far as my studies go, irregular.

If the course followed by the Attorney General in this case were pursued, then he, sitting in his office, with all his plenary powers and the great prestige which belongs to it, could arbitrarily fix prices, and threaten all classes in the community and arbitrarily interpret the laws, thus in practical effect ousting both the court and the jury from their jurisdiction, except where individuals or classes of individuals were bold enough to contest this great power and come to grips with the Government.

I think that the Attorney General in cases of this character, as in all cases where the settlement in its finality must be a settlement of fact by a jury, should establish by a series of decisions what is fair and right in accordance with the law, and not act arbitrarily and coercively.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have not much more time.

Mr. CANDLER. For a suggestion only.

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANDLER. Suppose it should develop in this case that the Attorney General of the United States has not fixed any price at all, but that the investigation made by him and the directions given by him were to the United States district attorney in this district with a view to determining whether or not above a certain price would be profiteering, and instructing him, if that was violating the antiprofiteering law, to prosecute for profitering. Suppose that is the fact in this case. Would there be anything wrong in that?

Mr. TINKHAM. In my view, the Attorney General, having made an examination into the facts, might have instructed his agent, the district attorney, that in all cases of this character he should prosecute, but that the final determination whether his opinion was correct or not under the law should be left to a jury. If he had given that advice to the United States district attorney, the right should have followed to have his district attorney prosecute and then go to the only tribunal which under the law could settle the fact, namely, a jury; but in this case, as I understand, he has in effect said that he would not prosecute, and made an agreement or arrangement with producers, some of whom perhaps make no profits and others very large profits, on the same basis; and that determination to prosecute no one who sells sugar for 17 or 18 cents, it seems to me, is arbitrary and improper and unauthorized.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not yield further.

Mr. LAZARO. Just for one brief question.

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not yield further, because I have only a very short time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. TINKHAM. The opinion of Attorney General Devens says:

> The authority of the Attorney General to render his official opinion is limited by the laws which create and define his office and does not permit him to give advice at the call of either House of Congress or of Congress itself, but only to the President or the head of an executive department of the Government. The absence of authority to respond to calls for legal opinions coming from sources other than those prescribed by law was early in the history of the Government suggested * * * by the then Attorney General, Mr. Wirt, * * * and no change in this respect has been made by the law creating the Department of Justice. The view thus taken has been invariably observed by my predecessors, including Attorneys General Taney, Crittenden, Bates, Evarts, and Williams. (15 Ops. A. G., 475, 476.)

This interpretation of the duties of the Attorney General's office and the limitations upon him was sent me by his assistant. It seems to me that in the particular case we are discussing an opinion has been rendered by the Attorney General rather than instructions issued to his agent in New Orleans. It seems to me upon the whole presentation of the facts in this case he has either fixed a price or approved of a fixed price for sugar, which is the same thing, which legally he has no right to do, or he has given his advice and opinion in advance of legal action.

Saying what in a certain class of cases will be considered profiteering and what will not is expressing legal opinion and giving advice in a very essential and detailed way. By his action of arbitrarily fixing the price of sugar he, in fact, gives immunity to those who at that price might be profiteers.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. In discussing this price-fixing proposition I should like to ask the gentleman by what authority or right or reason would the Attorney General fix the price of Louisiana sugar at 17–18 cents and the price of Michigan sugar at 10–11 cents.

Mr. TINKHAM. Simply by the arbitrary use of what I think is illegal and unwarranted action under the profiteering statute.

Mr. SNELL. There has been some claim that he made this price on account of an alleged short crop in Louisiana. Are there any other instances where price-fixing boards have paid more to the producers of one locality than to the producers of another locality simply because there was a short crop in one part of the country? For instance, did the wheat price-fixing board allow more to the States of the Northwest where they had a short crop of wheat than they allowed to some of the central western States where they had a large crop? Is there any other instance of that kind on record?

Mr. TINKHAM. There has been none. I understand, although I do not assert this positively, that the reason for the high price set for Louisiana sugar was because there was a short crop. But this is the first instance anywhere of the Government helping the producers of a short crop. In relation to wheat and other price fixing, the object has been to stimulate production. I think this is the first instance in the United States, even during the war, of an apparent intention to assist people who have short crops. If that were the policy of the Government, there is no reason why short crops of potatoes and apples and all foodstuffs should not be guaranteed, or the producers helped by the Government, and, of course, that would be utterly unsound economics.

Mr. SNELL. This is absolutely the only case of this kind?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is the only case that I know of.

The Attorney General came to Congress in the interest of the American people and declared that he desired to have Congress assist him in reducing the cost of living and requested certain laws against profiteering. One of his first acts has been to fix or approve of the increased price of Louisiana sugar to nearly double the former price, thereby having a tendency to raise the entire market to that level, as sugars from various sources at retail can not be distinguished.

I ask what effect it is going to have upon the disturbed condition of the American people to have the price of a staple such as sugar, more than a year after the war, increased in price by at least 100 per cent?

As the cost to the American people of a 2-cent increase in price is $180,000,000 per annum, and as undoubtedly the price of sugar will rise from 10 and 12 cents to 20 cents and 22 cents, if not higher, there may be added to the cost of living to the American people $940,000,000 per annum, and this inevitably follows in part from the action of the Attorney General by his recent action in relation to Louisiana sugar.

I believe the interrogatories should be passed and be immediately answered by the Attorney General, first for the benefit and information of the American people, and, second, for the settlement of the question whether he has the legal right to arbitrarily, in effect, fix prices, and, third, whether he can give immunity from prosecution to those who may make great profits under his rulings and otherwise could be convicted of profiteering before a jury.

I believe these interrogatories should pass. [Applause.]

If anyone desires time, I will yield to him. If not, I will move the previous question.

Mr. GARD. I desire some time. What is the parliamentary status, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, of course, had an hour. He has used 28 minutes. He has 32 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARD. I desire not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. TINKHAM. I am pleased to yield to the Representative from Ohio 10 minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have been, and I think nearly all Members of the House have been, in accord with any real, bona fide proposition which has for its purpose an honest investigation of the sugar question, since it is a question which comes right to the family of nearly every American householder. But, unfortunately, House resolution 394 seemed to me to be couched in language which either intentionally or unintentionally is offensive.

When sought to be presented as a privileged resolution there was a suggestion that the Chair should not make a precedent of this as a privileged resolution, but there would be no objection to its being considered by unanimous consent. Therefore from this side and the other side there was no objection to the consideration by unanimous consent.

The resolution carries some remarkable phraseology. In the first place, in the third subdivision, it is asked from the Attorney General whether it has been usual for the office of the Attorney General, in advance of legal action, to render an official opinion in relation to the United States criminal statutes and notify possible violators of his interpretation of them.

That means nothing in the interest of the investigation of the price of sugar. It is simply an attack on the Attorney General. As has been very well stated by the gentleman from Illinois, there can be no question but what the Attorney General, under the limit prescribed, has the right to take up with his subordinates, who are district attorneys, questions of the administration of the law. The Attorney General is an executive officer. He is charged with the conduct of the legal officers of the United States of America, and as such he has supervision, in a sense, of the district attorneys throughout the United States. It is not only legal but eminently proper; in fact, you could do no other way than to have cooperation between the Attorney General of the United States and those who represent him in the different districts.

So I take it that this inquiry in the language in which it is couched is not an inquiry which would tend to throw light on the investigation of the price of sugar, but is intended to be a criticism on the action of the Attorney General.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will, but I have but a short time.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not the practice, and is it not the proper practice, for the district attorneys to be directed absolutely by the Attorney General to discontinue a prosecution or to start a prosecution, and, therefore, has he not the right to direct him not to or to start a prosecution?

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the honorable Representative yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does the honorable Representative consider the statement made by Mr. Figg was correct when he said:

> That the Department of Justice has no right to fix the price or any other right except to prosecute profiteers in individual cases.

Mr. GARD. I do not know what Mr. Figg said, and I do not know who Mr. Figg is. This is my position: I have not objected to the consideration of this resolution, couched in offensive language though it may be. Nobody on this side has objected to it. My position is that I am willing to have that matter go to the Attorney General for his full and complete answer, because I feel that the Attorney General can and will answer it thoroughly and in the interest of entire justice to all the American people.

Mr. TINKHAM. May I state that there was no intention of using offensive language in the resolution, and I am sorry the gentleman has used that word?

Mr. GARD. It may be that the gentleman had no such intention, but the language nevertheless is subject to the construction I have placed upon it. If the gentleman has any such idea——

Mr. TINKHAM. In what particular does the gentleman think it is offensive?

Mr. GARD. I have tried to explain as best I may that I thought that it was not proper language of inquiry.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentlemna yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. The offensive language read by the gentleman from Ohio is the language of the Judiciary Committee and not the original language of the resolution by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARD. This is what occurred in the Judiciary Committee. I was not present, but I so understand from the gentleman from Massachusetts, and therefore I am violating no confidence. The gentleman from Massachusetts took these amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary and asked that they be adopted, and the Committee on the Judiciary adopted each and every one of the amendments which the gentleman from Massachusetts presented to them.

Continuing the argument that I was making, I will say that there should be little or no question about the facts in this case. Had the gentleman from Massachusetts read, or had the Members had sufficient interest to read, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 16, 1919—only two days ago—at page 712, they would have found a very succinct statement from the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] as to just what did occur. There are two paragraphs in which Mr. MARTIN, in answer to a question by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], states what did occur in the matter of such action as the Attorney General took on the sugar question. I shall not burden the House by reading it, because I do not desire to consume the time, and I do not desire to impede in the slightest the passage of this resolution.

I am willing to have it go to the Attorney General for his complete answer, notwithstanding the language in which it is framed, but the statement by the gentleman from Louisiana, the complete statement of what he understood, and the gentleman from Louisiana probably knows more about the sugar investigation than any man on the floor of the House—this matter of what he understood was done by the Attorney General or the Attorney General's department concerning the crop of Louisiana sugar is there fully stated.

There are many things in the framing of this resolution which are not facts. There are many requests or directions—because the word "request" is stricken out and "direction" put in—there are many directions for the expression of opinion, many directions for an answer as to law or authority, none of which is properly covered by a privileged resolution of the House seeking facts upon a certain matter.

As I have stated, I have not the slightest idea of impeding in any degree the passage of this resolution. I shall not move to strike out a single word. I am willing to have it go to the Attorney General, in the full knowledge that there is nothing to conceal, and that the Attorney General can make answer to the complete satisfaction of the American people.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield me five minutes?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield the gentleman from South Carolina five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I join the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] in expressing the hope that the House will unanimously adopt this resolution. I rise for the purpose, however, of calling attention to some of the facts in connection with the matter which seemingly are unknown to some Members of the House. The history of it is this: The Sugar Equalization Board is a private corporation. The entire stock in it is owned by the President of the United States. Its existence does not expire for a year or two. It bought the Cuban crop for this year, and its contracts expire December 31. In August last it called to the attention of the President the fact that these contracts would expire, and two letters were written by Mr. Zabriskie, one of the letters inclosing a memorandum. In this memorandum the statement was made that the board suggested to the President that the next year's crop be purchased, provided it was determined as the policy of the Government that next year's crop should be purchased and controlled by the Government. At that time the board faced this situation. While that corporation could exist during the next year and they could buy that crop, they could not control the sale and distribution of the sugar purchased unless the Congress extended the provisions of the Lever Act, because gentlemen know that no State could give to the Sugar Equalization Board in a charter the power to control the sale and distribution of sugar throughout the Nation. That power was given by the Lever Act.

With the proclamation of peace the Lever Act would expire, and if the President and that board purchased the next year's Cuban crop they would find themselves in possession of that crop but unable to control the sale or the distribution of sugar after the proclamation of peace. In August and September all men had a right to anticipate that by this time we would have had a proclamation of peace. The Sugar Equalization Board went before the Senate Agricultural Committee. Mr. Glasgow and Mr. Zabriskie appeared there and Mr. Glasgow urged then upon the Senate committee that they did not want the power to purchase the next year's Cuban crop unless they were given at the same time the power to control the sale and distribution of the crop. The reason is apparent. If they bought that crop and sold it to the jobber, then there would be no power that could curb the jobber or the retailer or the speculator, and either one could charge any price that he wanted to, and there would be no way in which he could be stopped. It is said that the Department of Justice could prosecute a retailer for profiteering, but that is not true, because the authority to prosecute for profiteering was an amendment to the Lever Act and expires when the Lever Act expires, when the proclamation of peace is issued.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption for a moment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts give me five minutes more?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 17 minutes remaining after the gentleman from South Carolina is through.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I would like the gentleman to confirm this statement, if I am correct. Did not Mr. Glasgow, a member of the Sugar Equalization Board and its counsel, bring to the attention of Congress on the 3d of October the fact that it was absolutely necessary to have congressional action in order to bring about the purchase of the Cuban crop?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. He did that, and he said this, that he did not want the powers of that board extended for the purpose of purchasing the sugar unless they also had the power to control the sale and distribution of it. That power was not given by the Congress. There is no reason here for charges and countercharges of responsibility in this matter. The fact is that we know that we did not give the power to control the sale and distribution which the Sugar Equalization Board wanted and that without that power they did not want to purchase. They may have been wrong; we may have been wrong. Those are the facts.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman again?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will pardon me, I can not yield at this time. This House a day or two ago recognized the righteousness of the position of the Sugar Equalization Board, and by the Morgan resolution it does continue the power to control the sale and distribution.

In the few minutes I have left, I want to say a few words with reference to the Louisiana situation. Gentlemen ask why there should be this difference in price, a very fair question. The facts have been reiterated again and again by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN]. The South experienced the worst season in years. The rains made the cotton crop short, and the same rains made the sugar crop short. Instead of producing 300,000 tons Louisiana poduced 100,000 tons. What happened? From all sections of the country there came to Louisiana men to buy the sugar of Louisiana. They offered 25 cents and 27 cents a pound for that sugar. Then the Louisiana producers were confronted with the decision as to whether they would sell. To whom could they go? To no one but the district attorney, the representative of the Department of Justice. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] says that a business man has not that right. Mr. Speaker, I have served as a prosecuting attorney, and I never failed to tell a man the law. I care not what precedent has been established heretofore, under the legislation that we have enacted during the war business men have been confronted every day of the year with the question, "Am I violating the law? Will my act violate the law?" How could a producer in Louisiana determine whether his action in selling for 25 cents or 27 cents would be a violation of the law?

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not yield.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman has had his time extended.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. My time is about gone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield five minutes more to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TINKHAM. I intended to do so, though I do not know whether I did. I do so yield it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SANFORD. I want to say that I recently asked the Attorney General through Mr. Figg directly, and the Attorney General stated to me through Mr. Figg, who has entire charge of the sugar matter, that they had not fixed any price as a fair price for sugar, that they would not, and that they could not, under his definition of his duty.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. He stated the fact. Now, there is no doubt about that. There must be intelligence enough in America to understand that the Department of Justice did not fix any price. The Department of Justice declared the policy of the department. It was declaring a policy and ought to have declared a policy. Here is the business man of this country, the Louisiana producer, in possession of the sugar. He does not know what the Department of Justice will call profiteering. Shall he sell at 25 cents and run the risk of being hauled into court? No sane business man in America wants to be hauled into a court charged with a violation of the law of the land. He goes to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice rightfully determined what they were going to call profiteering, after investigating the cost of producing sugar. After investigating the cost of producing that Louisiana crop they determined that, inasmuch as the Louisiana producers had produced only 100,000 tons as against 300,000 tons at practically the same expense, the cost of producing it was such that they would not prosecute a man for profiteering if he sold for less than 17 cents. But they did not fix the price at 17 cents. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] has declared on the floor that he sold his own sugar for 15 cents. The Department of Justice simply said that they would not prosecute for profiteering a man who sold for less than 17 cents, and the gentleman from Louisiana has declared his opinion, and it is worth something to the country, that within the next week or 10 days he looks for a further decrease in the price of sugar. If we have upon the statute books a law specifically declaring what the law is, then the citizen may follow it; but when you simply say that a man will be prosecuted for profiteering you and I know that honest, law-abiding men were left in doubt. Now, we know that fair-price committees have been established throughout this country. They fixed prices at which certain commodities should be sold, and business men were driven nearly crazy in their endeavor to find out what that price was to be. These Louisiana people came, as the gentleman from Illinois has said, to the only man who could tell them, and he simply said he would not prosecute any man who sold for less than 17 cents. He did right. I agree with what they have said heretofore as to not giving an opinion to individuals, but I consider it to be the duty of the Department of Justice under any administration to declare its policy under an act containing such broad language, in so far as that act applies to a commodity of such universal use.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will yield.

Mr. REAVIS. I recognize the gentleman has asserted a proper policy on the part of the Department of Justice when an inquiry is made as to the construction of a law to say what the law means, but does the gentleman contend that the Department of Justice in construing a law has authority or right or power to promise immunity for certain acts?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I believe the Department of Justice not only has the power under the law but, as I have just concluded saying, it is its duty to inform the country; and if the gentleman from Nebraska were in the Department of Justice as Attorney General, and I hope he may be some day in the distant future—and it will be distant—but, if he was, I would have an abiding faith that he would never refuse to tell them whether he would prosecute them for profiteering for selling sugar at 25 cents, 20 cents, 18, or 15 cents. His good common sense and sense of justice would not permit him to leave the honest business men of this country in doubt as to whether or not a transaction conducted in the usual manner would subject them to prosecution under any statute as indefinite as this one. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I will yield one more minute to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina in order to answer a question. Will the gentleman tell me the difference between fixing the price and concurring in a maximum price, as stated by the Attorney General in his telegram?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Of course I will tell the gentleman. If the Attorney General had said that the price of sugar should be 17 cents a pound the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] would not have sold his sugar at 15 cents a pound. That is not fixing the price. If the price had been fixed at 17 cents a pound, the gentleman from Louisiana would have gotten 2 cents a pound more. The Attorney General simply said he would not prosecute as profiteering a sale if the price was less than 17 cents a pound. They were offered 25 cents a pound, and the action of the Attorney General meant a saving of 8 cents a pound. He therefore saved $16,000,000 to the people who purchased that sugar. [Applause.]

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just spoken is a good lawyer, fair minded, and ordinarily a logical man. But it is surprising the argument that he has just made. The Department of Justice has taken upon itself the responsibility of regulating and equalizing the price of sugar in the United States, and in the performance of that duty has said to the man in Louisiana, "You are not profiteering though you sell at 17 cents a pound the very same article that another man is profiteering in if he sells for 11 cents a pound in another part of the country." Well, some one suggests if that is equalizing it is a curious sort of equalizing. I know of a beet-sugar factory in the Northwest that will lose money on its output produced this year unless it can secure about 18 cents a pound for its sugar, but the managers of that factory did not have the nerve to come before the Department of Justice and ask that they be singled out and assured that they be protected against prosecution if they charge 50 per cent more for their product than other factories charge for the same product. Of all the things that have occurred in the last couple of years that are not defendable from any standpoint of reason or logic or law, the action of the Department of Justice in this matter stands out as a bright, shining example.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Gentlemen have undertaken a very hard task when they attempt to defend the action of the department whose business it is to enforce the law and prevent profiteering, and which places one interpretation on the law as applied to one citizen in one part of the country and another interpretation on the law as applied to another citizen in another part of the country.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question just there?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is very brief.

Mr. PADGETT. I will make it short. Say, for instance, flour sells in the State of Minnesota at a reasonable price of $12 a barrel, and that that same flour sells in Alaska for $25 a barrel, would that be considered profiteering in Alaska?

Mr. MONDELL. The cases are not parallel at all, as the gentleman knows. They are in no wise similar.

Mr. PADGETT. They are confronted with different circumstances.

Mr. MONDELL. The Department of Justice has assured them that they could charge a certain price for an article, and other producers of exactly the same article in another part of the country are given to understand that their maximum price must be nearly 50 per cent less. And that is said to be in the interest of fixing and equalizing the price of sugar in America.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is no question of transportation in this price at all?

Mr. MONDELL. No question of transportation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question? The gentleman from Wyoming said the Department of Justice has told producers in one section of the country they could sell at a certain price and other producers in another section that they had to sell for less than half that. Does he mean to say that the Department of Justice told those people to whom he refers, in Michigan or elsewhere, that selling for more than half of their cost would be considered profiteering? If so, when and where did they do it?

Mr. MONDELL. The Department of Justice did give them to understand that if they charged more than a certain price they would be liable to prosecution for profiteering.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What price?

Mr. MONDELL. About 10 cents a pound for sugar in Michigan, Colorado, and elsewhere in the West as against 17½ cents a pound for Louisiana sugar.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman state when he did it, and to whom? Can he name anybody?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows perfectly well he is begging the question.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. The very basis of all this discussion is the fact, unchallenged and unquestioned, that, so far as the beet-sugar production of the country is concerned, the Department of Justice let it be known that a producer who charged more than 10½ cents at wholesale was a profiteer and that a producer who charged 17½ cents in Louisiana would not be considered a profiteer.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The following committee amendments were severally read and agreed to:

Page 1, line 1, after the word "hereby," strike out the word "requested" and insert in lieu thereof the word "directed."

Page 1, line 3, after the end of the line insert:

"(1) Whether he made, assented to, or approved in any way of a price for Louisiana sugar on the plantation of 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated."

Page 1, line 8, strike out the figure "1" and insert the figure "2."

In the same line, after the word "fixed," insert "or agreed that."

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "at price of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "should be."

Page 1, line 12, strike out all of lines 12 and 13 and all of lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 2.

"(3) Whether it has been usual for the office of the Attorney General in advance of legal action to render an official opinion in relation to the United States criminal statutes and notify possible violators of his interpretation of them; and whether he notified Louisiana sugar producers that under laws against profiteering they would not be prosecuted if they sold yellow clarified at 17 cents per pound and plantation."

Page 2, line 12, strike out the figure "3" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "4"; and in the same line, after the word "fixed," insert "or agreed to."

Page 2, line 14, after the word "granulated," insert "and how these facts were obtained."

Page 2, line 16, strike out all of lines 16, 17, 18, and 19.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will withdraw it until the division has been completed.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 134, noes 2.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point that a quorum is not present. The Chair thinks a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 293, nays 7, not voting 131, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—FOREIGN-TRADE AGENCIES.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution 22, which has just been messaged over to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 22.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enroll the bill (S. 2472) to amend an act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as follows:

Insert the matter proposed by the House amendment No. 15, and after "herein," on page 5, line 8, of the engrossed bill insert "Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prohibit the Federal Reserve Board under its power to prescribe rules and regulations from limiting the aggregate amount of liabilities of any or all classes incurred by the corporation and outstanding at any one time."

On page 5, line 24, of the engrossed bill strike out the word "not."

On page 5, line 25, of the engrossed bill, after "transacting," insert the word "any."

On page 5, line 25, of the engrossed bill, after "United States," strike out the comma.

On page 6, line 5, of the engrossed bill restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 21 and insert the matter proposed by said amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, these are simply corrections.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENTRY OF ALIENS INTO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 131, making immediately available the appropriation for the expenses of regulating further the entry of aliens into the United States, and that the same be immediately considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table joint resolution 131 and consider it. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, I always ask for the reading of a resolution which has never been acted upon or read in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That so much of the sum of $600,000 appropriated by section 4 of the act of October 29, 1919, entitled "An act to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States," as may be necessary, is hereby made immediately available for expenses of regulating entry into the United States in accordance with the provisions of the act approved May 22, 1918.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman make a statement about this. I have examined House resolution 261, a similar resolution, with the report upon it, but, of course, the report is properly short and does not give very much information.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the act of May 22, 1918, among other things, provided for the regulation of further entry of aliens into the United States. Under that act quite a force was employed in the various United States consulates abroad, engaged in making an examination of every application of an alien for a passport to the United States. The thought was that by exercising some jurisdiction and some care before an alien departed from some foreign port to the United States, if he was an undesirable person from a political standpoint, that is, if he was a bolshevist, an anarchist, or something of that kind, his application could be denied when presented to the American consul for visé. That act is still in force, but the department is without funds to carry out its provisions. On October 29 there was sent to the President an act that became a law without his signature, and the joint resolution will have to be amended as to the description of it because of that fact. That act provided that it should become effective upon the expiration of the act of May 22, and it seeks to accomplish the same purposes that the act of May 22 accomplishes. The act of May 22 by its terms ceases when the President shall issue a proclamation of peace.

There is no more money available for use under the act of May 22, 1918. The State Department informs us that the money that was appropriated for this purpose has been exhausted for some little time, and this joint resolution simply makes available the appropriation contained in act known as public act No. 79 of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As it is now, as I understand the gentleman, the Government of the United States maintains a large force abroad under the State Department to determine whether a man shall have the right to come to this country, and then maintains a large force in the United States under the Immigration Service to determine whether an alien who has come may enter the United States or whether he shall be deported, and also maintains another large force under the Department of Justice to ascertain whether he shall be deported. How many more forces is it necessary to maintain instead of correlating these forces in one body? The gentleman said, as I understood him, that the State Department determine whether a man seeking a passport to come into the United States is a Bolshevist. I do not understand that the State Department confine themselves to any such activities. If in their whim they think a man ought not to come here, they do not grant him a passport, and if I am correctly informed, they have frequently refused to grant passports for some reason or other, because they thought a man ought to stay at home, not because he was undesirable to become a citizen here.

Mr. GOOD. The duplication that the gentleman speaks of does not exist in one department. The facts, as I understand them, are that when an application for a passport is presented to an American consulate abroad for visé, that is acted upon through the State Department. Now, if the application is granted and the person who applies for the passport comes to the United States and presents himself to the immigration authorities, he comes under the Department of Labor.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They have to reexamine the matter.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. They reexamine the person with regard to his health and his finances——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And with regard to a long list of things which no one can remember unless he has the book before him.

Mr. GOOD. It is confined in large measure to his health, his finances, and his education.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And everything about him.

Mr. GOOD. They do not take into consideration the question that the State Department has investigated over on the other side as to his political desirability or undesirability.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think they do take that same question into consideration.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman will understand that so far as the Committee on Appropriations were concerned, they did not go into the subject that the gentleman's question leads to, because Congress had just acted upon this matter, and sent to the President on October 29 a bill continuing this service and appropriating $600,000 for its administration.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. To be available when?

Mr. GOOD. To be available at the expiration of the act of May 22.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This Congress had the right to suppose that it was not appropriating money for the present.

Mr. GOOD. They did suppose this: They supposed that peace would be declared——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Who?

Mr. GOOD. Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. GOOD. The committee that reported out the resolution, and the State Department that urged the resolution, did it because they thought that a proclamation of peace would be made early in November.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Any department that could not guess better than that ought not to have the control of much money.

Mr. GOOD. I am stating to the gentleman what the facts are. I agree that this was an awkward way of putting it. In passing the act known as public act 79 of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the Congress should have repealed the act of May 22, 1918, and then there would have been no mix-up of this kind. But, assuming that there would be a proclamation of peace, as they did assume—there is no question in my mind about that—the committee reported out and Congress adopted a provision that public act No. 79 should be effective upon the expiration of the act of May 22, 1918.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. After all, here is the situation: Here is a proposition to spend $600,000 between now and the 1st of July next. That is at the rate of $1,200,000 a year practically. That is a pretty expensive service to maintain abroad in reference to immigrants coming to this country and then maintain another expensive service here. Is there no place where the Government can reduce its expenses after the war is over? Instead every bureau and department increases the expenses. Here is an increase of expense and not a reduction. Nobody expects that the State Department will ever voluntarily reduce a dollar in expenses. It has never been inculcated with the idea of economy; it has never cared about economy under any administration. It is not likely to commence now unless we commence it for them.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. As far as the element of expense of administration of the law is concerned, I think it ought to be said that every would-be immigrant who presents himself to our consulate abroad for a visé of his passport is obliged to pay $2 for the expense of the administration and the visé.

In the month of October 53,000 immigrants came from various ports of the world to the ports of the United States. Every one of these 53,000 had to pay $2 for a visé of the passport. In other words, the receipts on the visés alone were something like $600,000, and the total administration of the law, even when immigration is larger, has not exceeded $75,000 a month.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, every department of the Government that has a right to impose fees thinks that the money belongs to them, and that they should employ somebody to use it.

Mr. ROGERS. The fact remains that this does not involve the United States Government in expending money. We absolutely make money as far as the visés go.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know about that; we could keep it in the Treasury.

Mr. SNELL. What becomes of the money?

Mr. ROGERS. The money is covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In my judgment, every branch of the service of the Government has got to reduce its expenditure; every branch of the Government service, and there is not a branch that will do it voluntarily. The only way to reduce expenses is for Congress to reduce its appropriations, and if we do not reduce them the people will get somebody else to do it.

Mr. GOOD. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman, and I will go as far as he will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I doubt that, but he can trail along the same path. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. Let me say that I propose to offer an amendment which will provide that not more than $450,000 shall be used for the fiscal year.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That amount was reported by the committee on the House bill, which is a similar bill. I do not want to be offensive to the gentleman, but these amendments are sometimes offered in the House, applying to economy, and still not very seriously insisted upon when they get into conference. The gentleman knows that the State Department will spend every dollar it can get, whether it needs it or not.

Mr. GOOD. I will say that if this resolution is agreed to and is agreed to in the House and the Senate, the State Department need not come back to the Committee on Appropriations for additional appropriations for the purpose this year. They must cut their cloth according to this appropriation as amended.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. Upon what basis was this $450,000 arrived at?

Mr. GOOD. On the basis of $75,000 a month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if I can be allowed 10 minutes to address the House on my late trip to Berlin.

Mr. GOOD. I want to say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that we are soon to take up a deficiency bill and that there will be some general debate on that, and if he will see the gentleman from South Carolina I think he can get the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 131) making immediately available the appropriation for the expenses of regulating further the entry of aliens into the United States.

Resolved, etc., That so much of the sum of $600,000 appropriated by section 4 of the act of October 29, 1919, entitled "An act to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States," as may be necessary is hereby made immediately available for expenses of regulating entry into the United States, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved May 22, 1918.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, strike out the words "the act of October 29, 1919," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Public act No. 79 of the Sixty-sixth."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "1918," in line 9, insert: "Provided, That not more than $450,000 of said sum shall be used during the remainder of the fiscal year 1920."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I think there was a verbal mistake in the first amendment which was offered.

Mr. GOOD. No; the Clerk did not read the word "Congress."

Mr. ROGERS. The Clerk read all there was on the paper which the gentleman sent up. The word "Congress" was omitted inadvertently.

Mr. GOOD. The copy I have before me has the word "Congress."

Mr. ROGERS. The copy before the Clerk did not have that word.

Mr. GOOD. Then I ask unanimous consent to modify the first amendment by adding the word "Congress" after the word "Sixty-sixth," so that it will read: "Public act No. 79 of the Sixty-sixth Congress."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to modify the first amendment he offered in manner indicated, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: Line 4, strike out the words "the act of October 29, 1919," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Public act No. 79 of the Sixty-sixth Congress."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution 261, which is similar to the resolution just passed, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that House joint resolution 261 do lie on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the sugar question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

APPROPRIATION FOR EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION, ETC.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11223) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Employees' Compensation Commission and the Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. Pending that I desire to see if we can not arrange for a division of the time of general debate.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving 15 minutes for an explanation of the bill, I have applications for 70 minutes. I would suggest, if the gentleman from South Carolina can get along with a similar amount, that we limit the debate to two hours and a half.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. GOOD. Then I ask unanimous consent to have the general debate limited to two hours and a half, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours and a half, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from South Carolina. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11223.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11223, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. More than a year has passed since the cessation of hostilities in the main theaters of the World War, and more than a year and a half will have elapsed from the date of the signing of the armistice before the beginning of the fiscal year 1921, for which the Secretary of the Treasury has just submitted estimates of public expenditures in the Book of Estimates and estimates of anticipated receipts in his annual report.

No doubt those who have not given the matter careful thought have assumed that the financing of the fiscal year 1921 would, except for the large item of interest on the greatly increased public debt, be relatively free from the burden of war-created and war-induced debts and expenditures. Such, however, is not the case. On the contrary, the coming fiscal year will witness the culmination of the growing burdens of the war's aftermath. It presents financial problems as serious in their way as any we met during the period of war. We can not increase taxes; we should not issue bonds; we have no alternative but to economize to the limit.

The patriotic enthusiasm which carried us over the period of direct war expenditures has passed, and the public attitude toward the financial operations of the Government is a curiously conflicting mixture of demand for relief from the burdens of taxation on one hand and of insistence upon the increase of Federal expenditures for a variety of purposes on the other.

The chairmen of the Committees on Appropriations in the two bodies, Senator WARREN in the Senate and Mr. GOOD in the House, have each made statements relative to the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1921 and the estimated revenues for the same period. Having in mind both of these statements, I feel it my duty to further call attention to the situation relative to national receipts and expenditures, and to emphasize the absolute necessity of the practice of the most rigid economy in public expenditures the next fiscal year.

On my first examination of the estimates of appropriations and expenditures, I stated that in my opinion the watchword of this Congress must be economy—economy without parsimony—but after a further examination of the financial situation I feel that not only must the watchword of the Congress be economy but economy even to the point of parsimony.

VIEWS OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report issued a few days ago, sounded a note of warning, "in view of the innumerable requests that are constantly being pressed upon Congress," against a "riot of public expenditure after the war, the consequence of which could only be disastrous." The Secretary advises us that his "optimistic outlook of the future of the Government's finances * * * is based upon the practice of the most rigid economy, and any other policy means a calamitous upsetting of the entire program."

The Secretary is entirely sound in his view of the matter, and it is to be regretted that in the absence of legislation which makes the Secretary responsible for the estimates presented to him for transmittal he had presented to him by the heads of the various departments and agencies of the Government and transmitted to Congress estimates of appropriations of the stupendous total of nearly $5,000,000,000.

Enormous as these figures are, they do not include certain sums totaling hundreds of millions to cover appropriations heretofore made; for necessary operations in connection with the public debt; to pay bonus and added compensation carried in current appropriation bills and likely to be continued; and to provide for certain additional expenditures arising out of existing obligations or pending legislation.

THE WAR HANG-OVER.

Let us for a moment consider the financial situation in some detail. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the deficit in the general fund of the Treasury on June 30, 1920, at the beginning of the fiscal year for which we must now provide, at more than three billions of dollars. This huge sum, three times the amount of the public debt at the beginning of the war, is being carried at the present time in a variety of forms of short-time Government obligations.

Such a sum as the immediate hang-over of war expenditures at a time when increased taxation was at least debatable, when increased bond issues were contemplated, or a considerable excess of receipts over liabilities anticipated, would not, to a country as rich as ours, be a matter that need occasion serious alarm. But a floating unbonded debt of that size at a time when there is a widespread demand for the reduction of taxes, when further bond issues are inadvisable, and when estimates of expenditure, without taking into consideration any of the many special demands that are being made, are equal to or in excess of the probable revenues, presents a situation in which the practice of economy of the severest type becomes absolutely essential if we hope to place our fiscal operations on a sound basis and avoid dangerous financial situations.

THE ESTIMATES.

The estimates of appropriations for the ordinary expenditures of the Government, and printed in the Book of Estimates, total $4,865,410,031.62. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House has called attention to the fact that these estimates do not include a number of large items, aggregating over $228,000,000, which may be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury without action by Congress, and which, in the main, will probably be expended. To this sum Mr. GOOD further adds the sum of $40,000,000 to cover increased pay heretofore granted to postal employees and over $30,000,000 to cover the bonus of $240 to certain civil employees of the Government. To this he adds estimates of probable deficiencies and supplemental estimates amounting to $85,000,000, making a total of over $384,000,000 which he adds to the estimates.

To these sums of probable expenditure, not carried in the Book of Estimates, must be added the sum of $68,000,000, the estimated expenditure for the first year under bills increasing the pensions of the veterans of the Civil and Spanish Wars, which are now on the calendar and likely to become law before the beginning of the fiscal year.

THE RETURN OF THE RAILWAYS.

Then we come to the question of the railways. They have cost the National Treasury on an average more than $50,000,000 per month since they were taken under Federal control, a total of expenditures and appropriations of $1,250,000,000.

With the return of the roads to private management we shall see the beginning of the end of that burden on the Treasury and the taxpayer, and eventually the return of a part of our expenditure; but manifestly that relief can not come at once.

In answer to the request of Senator CUMMINS, Swagar Sherley, Director of the Division of Finance of the Railway Administration, in a letter dated November 10 last, gave estimates of the amounts that in his opinion would be required in the way of appropriations in connection with the enactment of legislation turning the railways of the country back to private management.

In presenting his figures the director took pains to emphasize the fact that they were only estimates, and as such liable to change. The amounts thus estimated were in excess of $415,000,000, if the terms of the Senate Cummins bill are followed, and in excess of $363,000,000 if the provisions of the House Esch bill are adopted. In a note accompanying these estimates the director stated that, owing to the difficulty of immediately converting into cash certain assets of the Railway Administration, the Congress should appropriate at least $200,000,000 in excess of the sums above stated to meet this situation.

The Esch bill as it passed the House carried an appropriation of $250,000,000 as a loan fund, which must be provided if this provision of the House bill should be enacted into law. Adding to the estimate of the director, based on the Senate bill, his further estimate of $200,000,000 to tide over the period of asset liquidation, we have the total of $615,000,000, and adding to his estimate under the House bill the loan of $250,000,000 carried in that bill on the theory that one of these items takes the place of the other, we have in one case, in round figures, $613,000,000 and in the other $615,000,000. I shall take the smaller of these figures as the estimate of the sum of the appropriations necessary in connection with the turning back of the railroads to private management.

Large as this sum is, it is about $400,000,000 less than the average cost to the Treasury for a like period under public management, for we are in this matter dealing with a period of 18 months, and for the purposes of this estimate it matters not whether these sums are appropriated in the latter part of this or the first part of the next fiscal year. In the former case they would increase the item of deficit at the end of the present fiscal year instead of swelling the amount of appropriations for 1921.

THE STUPENDOUS TOTAL.

Summing up these various items, we have as the total of the deficit at the end of the present fiscal year and of estimates of appropriations carried in the Book of Estimates, and of further estimates of expenditures which seem almost inevitable, the stupendous sum of $9,086,358,574.62 as the amount of continuing obligations and estimated expenditures we are called upon to reckon with in our financial operations for the fiscal year which begins the 1st of next July.

In tabulated form these items are as follows:

Estimated deficit in general fund, June 30, 1920, report of the Secretary of the Treasury	$3,155,888,543.00
Estimate of expenditures for fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, as submitted in Book of Estimates	4,865,410,031.62
Expenditures enumerated by chairman of Appropriations Committee not included in the Book of Estimates	384,060,000.00
Estimated expenditures under Civil War and Spanish War pension bills, now reported	68,000,000.00
Estimated expenditures on account of railroads	613,000,000.00
Grand total	9,086,358,574.62

Let us turn now to the estimates of receipts. As presented by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report they are as follows:

Customs	$325,000,000.00
Internal revenue:
Income and excess profits	3,000,000,000.00
Miscellaneous internal revenue	1,190,000,000.00
Public-land sales	1,000,000.00
Miscellaneous sources (including estimated return of $500,000,000 of capital stock of grain corporation)	896,000,000.00
Panama Canal tolls, etc	$8,000,000.00
War-savings certificates	175,000,000.00
Deposits to retire Federal reserve and national-bank notes	25,000,000.00
Postal savings bonds	350,000.00
Postal revenues	415,500,000.00
Total estimated receipts	6,035,850,000.00
Balance of estimated liabilities over estimated receipts	3,050,508,574.62

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Has any estimate been made by the Secretary of the Treasury for the payment of interest due on money advanced to foreign countries?

Mr. MONDELL. I am coming to that.

These estimates of receipts are, in my opinion, liberal. I am of the opinion that we are likely to be disappointed in almost every item, and particularly in the miscellaneous items under the head of internal revenue and the miscellaneous item of $896,000,000, which includes an estimated return of $500,000,000 from the capital stock of the grain corporation and large sums from war-salvage sales and other like sources. At any rate, we may be quite certain that this sum of receipts will be diminished rather than increased, and possibly by a very considerable sum.

These official estimates of receipts are notable, however, in that they carry no estimate of receipts on account of interest on our loans of nearly $10,000,000,000 to foreign Governments. The interest on these loans, if paid, would increase our receipts and lighten our burdens for the year by nearly $500,000,000.

In his annual report the Secretary of the Treasury gave notice of his purpose not to require cash payment of interest on these foreign obligations for the next two or three years and to fund the same. A few days since the newspapers carried a statement that agreements to that effect had been entered into with our foreign creditors. I express no opinion as to the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make this arrangement, which will increase our loans to foreign Governments a billion or two above the fixed limit of ten billions. The fact that such action was taken reduces our income or increases our outlay, whichever way you care to put it, half a billion annually.

THE BALANCE OF LIABILITIES.

Subtracting the grand total of receipts, as above estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, from the total of estimated liabilities and appropriations, we have a balance of estimated liabilities over estimated receipts of $3,050,508,574.62.

Mr. EMERSON. How does the Secretary of the Treasury claim authority to extend the payment of this interest without authority from Congress?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know. Those who seek to minimize the significance of these stupendous figures will insist that the estimates of expenditure are excessive. That is true so far as some of the regular estimates of appropriations carried in the Book of Estimates are concerned. At least we must make that true when we come to write our appropriation bills—make it true by reductions of hundreds of millions.

Let us examine for a moment these regular estimates in which we must find the stupendous reductions that must be made if we shall avoid a disastrous outcome and compare them with the appropriations for the same purposes for the present fiscal year. They are as follows:

Table comparing by bills estimates of regular annual appropriations for the fiscal year 1921 with the appropriations made for the fiscal year 1920, during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

(Prepared by the clerks to the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House Dec. 3, 1919.)

The column of 1920 appropriations does not include the sums carried for that fiscal year in deficiency and miscellaneous appropriation acts for similar purposes.

The estimated appropriations for 1921 will be found in detail in the annual Book of Estimates, House Document No. 411, transmitted to Congress on December 1, 1919, and the estimated revenues for 1921 in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1919.

	Estimates, 1921.	Appropriations, 1920.	Increase, estimates 1921 over appropriations for 1920.	Decrease, estimates 1921 under appropriations 1920.

[1] This sum does not include any amount for increased compensation to Government employees.

Of course, these tremendously extravagant estimates of the Government departments and bureaus must and will be greatly trimmed. With two possible exceptions, the Post Office and pension bills, every appropriation bill which will be reported at this session will show a substantial reduction below the estimates—and in the aggregate I anticipate a reduction below the regular estimates well in excess of a billion dollars.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In the course of the long and distinguished service of the gentleman from Wyoming here in the House, does the gentleman recall many instances where estimates submitted were not always larger than the appropriations carried for the current fiscal year?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; I remember many cases where the estimates submitted were not greatly in excess of the amounts which were appropriated. We had a conspicuous example of that under the last Republican administration, when estimates were presented which had been carefully examined and were presented to Congress in sums which entitled them to the favorable consideration of the Congress and its committees and which approximately measured the real needs of the public service. But here are estimates following a great war, when we have an enormous bonded indebtedness of the Government, costing over a billion dollars per annum in interest, and a floating indebtedness of $3,000,000,000 and more, and yet the estimates for the Army alone equal and exceed, when we add the estimate for fortifications, the entire expenses of the Government for all purposes for the year prior to the late war. These estimates are so extravagant that it is difficult to characterize them in parliamentary and inoffensive language. [Applause on the Republican side.]

WHERE CUTS CAN BE MADE.

The estimates for the Army, of nearly a billion dollars, will, with the exception of the fortifications bill, stand the heaviest cut. They should be reduced at least by half. The estimates for sundry civil expenditures will stand a very heavy reduction. The estimates for fortifications will stand the heaviest cut of all. The naval estimates may be largely reduced without impairing the efficiency of our Naval Establishment. River and harbor estimates are not large, but they will stand a substantial reduction. And so all along the line heavy reductions must be made or we face disaster.

And I am pleased to know that the first appropriation bill which will be reported this session—the Indian appropriation bill—will carry a sum very much below the estimates and very considerably below the expenditures for the current year.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is simply this: Does the gentleman care to state whether he approved the postponement of interest on the foreign loans?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want to embarrass the Secretary or the Treasury Department. If there is any necessity for it, if there is an actual necessity for it, if it must be done, then I very greatly regret that necessity. I am not certain that the Secretary has authority in law to do what he suggested in his report he proposed to do and what the papers say he has done in this matter.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I just want to ask if the gentleman did not believe that these estimates for the War Department could be greatly reduced if the War Department would exercise a greater diligence in disposing of the immense quantity of materials which they have on hand?

Mr. MONDELL. I do; and yet I think that the estimate of the receipts from salvage sales for the next fiscal year is probably too high. It is certainly more than they would receive if the War Department continued its past policy in that regard. We shall continue to prod them to dispose of the surplus. We have compelled the department to sell vast quantities of foodstuffs, automobiles, and so forth, and hope the good work along this line will be continued.

But even these great reductions will not suffice if we are to embark upon a program involving large appropriations in new fields or largely increased expenditures for pay and compensation. We should, by all means, effect some considerable reduction in the volume of the floating debt. We must not, except for reasons that are absolutely imperative, take any chances on increasing it, and therefore the savings that I have suggested, vast as they are, must, to be effective, be accompanied with the most stringent economies along other lines.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a single question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I assume the gentleman's suggestion would include the reduction of the force in the offices here in Washington?

Mr. MONDELL. If the estimates are reduced, as I suggest, there must be a great reduction in the force in the offices here in Washington and in the number of Federal employees all over the country.

As to the estimates which have been added to those carried in the Book of Estimates, they are not only not excessive, they are, on the contrary, very conservative as to the items which they cover, and still more conservative when we think of the almost limitless variety of demands for increased expenditures for which no estimate whatever is made. And yet these estimates, outside the Book of Estimates, total more than $965,000,000.

NONE OF THE ESTIMATES CARRY ANY SUMS FOR NEW PROJECTS OR INCREASED PAY.

Let it be borne in mind that none of the estimates carry a single penny of estimated expenditure on account of a perfectly bewildering variety of new and unusual requests and demands which are being made on the Treasury. They do not carry, for instance, any sums whatever for increased pay or allowances for men or officers of the Army or Navy. They do not carry a single penny for increased pay above what they are now receiving for officials, clerks, and other employees of the civil establishment. They carry no estimates for loans, bonuses, or development projects for the benefit of ex-service men. They do, however, carry liberal items for insurance, compensation, and vocational training for those discharged from the military and naval services, who are entitled to the same under the law.

Other than the reductions we can make in the regular estimates, which must, and I believe will, be very heavy, the statement which I have presented of estimated outlay is, in view of the very great demands which have been made and which are likely to continue to be made, very conservative. Certain suggestions of increased pay for the officers and men of the Army and Navy which have been earnestly urged would run into the hundreds of millions. Nobody knows how many millions of increased pay to civil employees may be recommended by the Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries. We do know, however, that the appropriating committees are constantly besieged with requests for increased pay, which if allowed even in part would increase the totals of expenditure many millions.

And, of course, if there is any increased pay in the Military Establishment, that increased pay must be reflected all through all the civil establishments, for up to this time we have not increased the pay of a single officer of the Government receiving more than $2,500.

Proposals and suggestions of appropriations on behalf of the men recently composing our great armies run all the way from a plan that would involve the expenditure of perhaps $100,000,000 per annum for some years to plans that would involve the expenditure of several billions and one plan at least that would involve obligations of tens of billions of dollars.

It is for the Congress to determine what is to be done in all these matters; but in arriving at that determination let us remember that we have passed the period when, under the stimulus of war enthusiasm, the instinct of self-preservation, and the determination to finish a great job gloriously, we could spend billions without a thought as to where the money was to come from, who was to pay it, or when it was to be paid.

THE GRAY DAWN OF THE MORNING AFTER.

We have reached the time when in a period comparable with the gray dawn of the morning after we must soberly and possibly somewhat painfully set about the uninspiring but essential work of restoring things to normal conditions. We can only do this by courageously meeting the obligations incurred in the period of war and stress and enthusiasm, and by setting our faces like flint against unnecessary expenditures.

I close, as I began, by quoting the Secretary of the Treasury, who, calling attention to the fact that "Government expenditures inevitably increase the cost of living," says "it is earnestly urged that Congress deny every proposal for expenditures in new fields or the continuance or expansion of old, unless they represent imperative and essential need."

I am sorry that the various departments of the Government did not follow the good advice of the Secretary of the Treasury and keep their estimates within the bounds he suggests; but our duty is plain—we must not only cut the estimates in excess of a billion, but we must turn a deaf ear to every new demand or request which is not imperative.

In no other way can we perform our duty to our country—the duty of restoring public expenditure to a sound and safe basis, of reducing as soon as possible the burden of taxation, and of moving forward on sound constructive lines of public policy. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reverting to the proposition of the payment or nonpayment of the interest on our foreign obligations, the gentleman stated that he did not know upon what authority of law the Secretary of the Treasury was proceeding in making that kind of an agreement deferring the payment of interest.

In view of its importance, involving a difference of $500,000,000 or more in the amount to meet our current obligations, does not the gentleman think it is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations, or some other appropriate committee having jurisdiction of that matter, to make an investigation of that question and to ascertain whether or not there is an authority of law for such agreement, and, if not, to pass such legislation as will carry out the will of Congress upon that proposition?

Mr. MONDELL. In the first instance, the duty devolves on the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary, so far as I know, has not addressed Congress on the subject or asked our advice, has expressed no opinion publicly in regard to it except that contained in his annual report. The matter is a tremendously important one. But if the Secretary proceeds, under what he conceives to be his authority, to make these arrangements deferring interest payments and funding these unpaid obligations, I do not know just what we can do about it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will recall that the President in his last message flatly declared that this administration would view with serious alarm the payment of any gold on the loans to European countries.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman correctly quotes the President. There have been curiously contradictory statements relative to the payment of interest on the foreign debts. The Secretary in his report states that the interest up to date has been paid in cash, except in some cases involving comparatively small sums and which I understand to be the Russian debt.

A few days after the Secretary's report came out a newspaper article appeared, signed by a well-known writer, stating that no penny of the interest on the foreign loans had ever been paid. Now, curiously enough, those two statements, apparently as contradictory as statements could be, were both in a way correct. When the Secretary spoke of cash, it might have been, and I think was, cash that we loaned to our foreign creditors, which, of course, they could use to pay the interest on former loans. My opinion is that so far none of our foreign creditors have drawn upon their home assets to pay the interest on the debt they owe us.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know myself when this new policy was undertaken in not receiving any of the interest on our foreign loans, but I do recall very distinctly that the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, stated to the Ways and Means Committee that interest was being drawn at 5 per cent on the full amounts of our foreign loans at that time.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that in every case, except, perhaps, the Russian loan, where interest has become due up to very recently, we have been continuing to make loans to the Governments that owed us interest, and, of course, so long as you are loaning generously to a creditor he has no difficulty in paying you the interest on his former loan.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MONDELL. If I have the time.

Mr. CRAGO. I noticed the gentleman made a statement there that more than $100,000,000 was being asked for the increase of pay of the Army and Navy and Marine Corps, and so forth.

Mr. MONDELL. Some of the bills that have been introduced would amount to considerably more than a hundred millions.

Mr. CRAGO. I simply wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the only bill which has been seriously considered by the Senate or the House would not amount to more than half of that amount.

Mr. MONDELL. That might be true at the start, but nobody knows what it might amount to when it was enacted into law, and no one knows how many millions more would have to be paid to the civil employees of the Government to match those increases in the pay of those in the Military Establishments.

Mr. CRAGO. That may be true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there has never been a time in the history of this Congress when the estimates furnished by the departments have not been greatly in excess of the amounts appropriated by the Congress. That that is true is inevitable. Every employee of a department who is worthy of employment is enthusiastic about his own occupation. He believes that the activity he has immediate control of is more essential to the existence of this Nation than any other activity, and he therefore seeks to extend it and to ask for larger appropriations in order to make it a more important activity. Those estimates are sent to the head of a department, who in turn submits them to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has no power to cut them down, but who, acting merely as an intermediary, submits them to Congress. And the only serious effort to correct this is now being made by the Congress, supported by Republicans and Democrats alike, in the effort to establish a budget system.

And that brings me to the consideration of an article that was printed in the RECORD on Tuesday morning, introduced by Senator FERNALD, an article written by Senator MCCORMICK, of Illinois, which appeared in the Annalist, and about which I desire to make a few comments. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] said that in discussing the budget system men preferred to make strong statements rather than accurate ones. And yet we certainly would not expect that to be true of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], who is posing as an authority on the subject of the budget.

I read now not from the RECORD but from the Annalist, in which this interesting and enlightening article first appeared. The Annalist is a magazine of finance, commerce, and economics. The leading article appearing on the first page of the issue of December 1, 1919, is by MEDILL MCCORMICK, United States Senator from Illinois.

Now, business men take this magazine, and they look to it for facts about the fiscal affairs of the Government and for information as to the budget system. And do you know, I feel sorry for them to-day. I am sorry for them, because if ever a people were misled they have been misled. They have a right to expect the Annalist to publish articles by men familiar with the subjects on which they assume to write and they have a right to expect accurate statements from a United States Senator. In this article Senator MCCORMICK states:

During my last term in the legislature I had written, and persuaded a colleague to introduce, a budget bill.

Do you know when I read that I thought that, after writing the bill, he had persuaded a colleague to introduce it because of his excessive modesty. But no. I was mistaken. He did that for this reason; this is what he says about it—

Lest if I fathered it some people might regard it as a measure of impolitic reform.

You know those benighted members of the Illinois Legislature, hopelessly involved in ignorance about the budget system, if they read that bill written by Mr. McCormick would say that it was "a piece of impolitic reform." [Laughter.] They would know that here was a progressive measure by a great reformer and that as he never stooped to politics, of course it would be impolitic. So he persuaded another to introduce his bill; but he hastens to say:

I was not able long to conceal the actual paternity of the bill.

Of course not! So replete with wisdom, so stocked with statesmanship, he could not hide it even from those hopelessly benighted members of the Illinois Legislature. [Laughter.] As an old countryman says down my way, "It got out on him." It got out on him that he was the father of the bill [laughter], and as a result he says he "enjoyed for the balance of the legislative session the affectionate derision of some of my colleagues." He enjoyed derision because he had introduced a budget bill. [Laughter.]

Now, that is a terrible reflection upon that legislative body. But, do you know, I cherish sometimes the opinion that it was simply a mistake on the part of Representative McCormick that there was affectionate derision. He did not understand it. He supposed the derision was due to their hopeless ignorance, but I fear their derision was due to the fact that the statements he made in connection with it were as inaccurate as those he makes in this article. I say that because he says in this article:

When we began the agitation for budget reform in Illinois I startled the taxpayers by pointing out that the cost of the State government was increasing then at the rate of 200 per cent every 10 years.

He "startled" them. [Laughter.] That is the gentleman's affliction. He prefers to "startle" people rather than to inform them. [Laughter.] That I wish to prove. This paper here is the Annalist—and I am going to analyze this statement for a few minutes, with your permission, because the business men of the country ought to know how enlightening this article is. He says:

The business men of the country are crying out for a national budget. The American taxpayer for the first time in our history is acutely conscious of the cost of the Federal administration. His purse tells him there is a Government situate on the Potomac. He has reason to believe that not only has his Government become costly, but that it is inefficient and wasteful. He is uncertain as to the exact increase in the cost of the Federal enterprise, and he is not precise about the details of the reform to which he is entitled, and which has "budget" and "administrative efficiency" current in the political vernacular. But he is very certain that there has got to be a grand housecleaning.

The third and last session of the last Congress appropriated for one year about $7,000,000,000, or ten times the aggregate appropriations of both sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress, 20 years ago. For the next several years government will cost about ten times as much annually as it did five years ago.

Now, think of that! Just after the majority leader has finished a speech earnestly pleading for economy, just when the junior Senator from Illinois is predicting a Republican administration and a return of his party to power, he tells you that your expenditures for the next several years are going to be ten times what they were five years ago.

Now, what were they five years ago? Five years ago the expenditures were $1,116,000,000. He says:

For the next several years government will cost about ten times as much annually as it did five years ago.

Therefore you are going to appropriate $11,160,000,000 for the next several years. And yet the majority leader stands here and complains about estimates for $4,000,000,000—a mere paltry sum of $4,000,000,000—when this authority on budget reform tells you that it is going to amount to over $11,000,000,000 for the next several years.

But now I want to be fair to him. He did not mean that. I am going to save you some money. He says that on one page, and when I turn over the page I find this:

As far back as Col. Roosevelt's time, under the most energetic and vigorous Executive of our day, the annual cost of government amounted to one-tenth of what it will be during the next several years.

During the Roosevelt administration the average expenditure was just a little under $800,000,000, and as he says it was only one-tenth of what it is going to be for the next several years, it follows that for the next few years it will be $8,000,000,000. So by turning over this page I have saved $3,000,000,000 a year for the American people for the next several years. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. Keep on turning. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. One could keep on turning in this article with no hope of finding any more accuracy than is displayed in the part of the article that I have read. But the lowest estimate he will let you out on is $8,000,000,000, when the estimates about which all of us to-day are complaining amount to $4,000,000,000. But we should not take it seriously. The gentleman is an impolitic reformer; therefore we have to look at it in that light. [Laughter.]

Let us read further. He has a remedy for the situation. I will give it to you. He has given it to the world in this article. Here it is, under the heading of "Placing responsibility." Here is what he would do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He admits the paternity of this scheme? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Oh, no. That could not be. My friend could not expect him to. He was discovered in the Illinois Legislature, but he acted with like modesty when it came to the introduction of this scheme. I sent for a copy of the bill introduced by the Senator from Illinois, and I found that "Mr. KEYES (for Mr. MCCORMICK) introduced the following bill." [Laughter.] The Senator from Illinois, remembering in what affectionate derision he was held in the Illinois Legislature, when he came to introduce this bill hesitated, and then prevailed upon Mr. KEYES, whoever he is, to introduce this bill. [Laughter.]

But the magazine article would indicate that he is now willing to admit the paternity of it. It has "got out on him," as in the former case. Having got out on him, let us see what he says. I was about to discuss the remedy. He says:

I would reduce the appropriating committees from 14 in the House and 14 in the Senate to 1 in each Chamber.

The distinguished Senator whose name appears at the head of this article served in this House for two years. I withdraw that statement—he was a Member of this House for two years and visited us now and again, but never long enough to learn that there are only eight appropriating committees in this House. And this distinguished authority on budget reform tells the business men of the country that the remedy is to cut down the appropriating committees from 14 to 1.

Now, you know a man grows or it is hoped that he grows in wisdom, and we would have thought that, having graduated to the Senate, he would learn how many committees in the Senate were appropriating committees. He says there are 14 appropriating committees in the Senate. Therefore I send to him a message through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that there are only 9 appropriating committees in the Senate, and that his remedy therefore is not so difficult, because instead of cutting out 13 he has to cut out only 7 here and has to cut out only 8 over there.

But I want you to see what the gentleman informed the business men of the country about other matters. He says:

There has been a tremendous acceleration in the rate of increase in taxation and public expenditure. Roughly speaking, government cost 30 per cent more at the end of the 10 years 1901–1911 than it did at the beginning of that decade. Then a convention at Baltimore denounced Republican waste and extravagance, nominated Woodrow Wilson, and rode into office. The increase for the five years 1913–1917 was 60 per cent, or twice what it was during the 10 years which preceded the assembling of the denunciatory convention at Baltimore.

Now, let us see. If the Senator had taken the trouble to look at the figures which were available to every Member of Congress, he would have found that, instead of that being true, the appropriations for the four years of Democratic administration average $1,062,930,372.76 and that the average of the 10 years given by him was $879,125,192.54, a difference between the average for the four years of Democratic administration and the average for the 10 years preceding of $183,805,180.22.

Now, the Senator from Illinois says that it was 60 per cent greater, which he says means only twice as great, and the figures which were available to him, as they are available to us all, show that there was a difference of only $183,000,000 per year. It is a mistake of only 40 per cent, which is not a material matter to the Senator from Illinois.

But business men want facts, and even had he told the truth, that the increase was 20 per cent, why should he not call attention to some of the facts? During the 10 years that he cited, and to which I have referred, the average amount appropriated for the Army was about $80,000,000, and during the Democratic administration from 1913 to 1917 that amount increased so that it averaged $100,000,000, an increase of $20,000,000. The Navy jumped from an appropriation of $78,000,000 in 1903 to $149,000,000 in 1916 and $144,000,000 in 1915. The Senator from Illinois when a Member of the House was a strong advocate of preparedness, and now he criticizes the Democratic administration for increasing appropriations for the Army and Navy. In 1913, 1914, 1915, and 1916, the years cited by him, it was wise that increased amounts should have been appropriated for these purposes, and we would have saved money had we made even larger investments for Army and Navy purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to discredit the Senator from Illinois or to expound a proposition beneficial to his side of the question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Oh, my good friend, my purpose is simply to prevent the Senator from Illinois from misleading business men who read the Annalist, this magazine of finance and commerce, into believing all of the inaccurate statements he has made in this magazine article, so that the record may be kept straight, and so that the readers of that magazine may not be kept awake at night wondering what is going to become of a country so badly governed as Mr. MCCORMICK leads them to believe this country is.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. As a member of the Illinois delegation it seems to me that it is quite unfair to the distinguished Senator from my State to attack him and his position upon legislation of this character without his having an opportunity to be heard in reply.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I would not attack the Senator from Illinois. Why, I am simply referring to the statements in his magazine article. Instead of attacking the distinguished Senator, I said that he was for preparedness, that he approved of it, that he was a strong advocate of preparedness, always urging it, and I would go further and say that I am satisfied the Senator from Illinois did not read this article carefully when it was submitted to him for his signature, and that I believe he did not have time to do so, and that some of the publicity men associated with him are chargeable with its inaccuracies, and that they should be censured by him for having put him in a very embarrassing position; because we all know—the gentleman who is addressing me knows—that there are not 14 appropriating committees in this House. The gentleman knows that, does he not?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Quite so.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I thought the gentleman did, and the gentleman knows there are not 14 appropriating committees in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The gentleman's approval of the distinguished Senator from Illinois is quite democratic.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is right. I love to be democratic, and I am very fond of the distinguished Senator, but I want to keep the business men of the country straight in this matter of budget reform, which so vitally concerns our prosperity, and is a matter of so great interest to all of us.

But returning to the Senator's article, I have stated that the appropriations for the Army and the Navy increased during those years. The pensions increased from $139,000,000, in 1903, to $195,000,000, in 1914. I know the Senator from Illinois was in favor of that. He was in favor of these increased appropriations for the payment of pensions to the old soldiers. When in the House he always voted for these increased appropriations, and now has published this article quoting him as criticizing these increases as alarming. Why did he not become alarmed when he was voting for them?

And yet he would refer to these increases as being almost criminal, leading the business men of the country to believe that somebody down here was frittering away the money of the taxpayers. Here is the post-office appropriation. In 1903 the amount was $138,000,000, and in 1915 $313,000,000. The gentleman from Illinois ought to know what caused a part of that increase. I have heard gentlemen on the floor of the House say that it was due in part to the subsidy to the newspapers in the rate on second-class matter. I know the gentlemen who read the Annalist will know that increased appropriations are due to the fact that the business of the country has grown. It is not surprising in this great country that there should be an increase of $183,000,000 a year, during 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917, over and above the average expenditures of 1903 to 1913. Even prior to our entering the war, the war in Europe necessitated unusual expenditures, and notwithstanding this the increase was only $183,000,000.

I regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] seems to think that I would criticize or attack the Senator. I know he is in thorough accord with every statement of fact I have made, and I am expressing no opinion at all except that I trust the Senator will find time to read the RECORD and that he does not rely upon others reading it for him, or, if he does, that he have a competent man to do so. I trust that he will read the few comments I have made on the magazine article so that the next time the Annalist carries a story by him it will give to the business men of the country some real facts about the fiscal affairs of this country and about budget reform. The necessity for budget legislation is so apparent that it is unnecessary to make such ridiculously inaccurate statements to startle the people of the Nation as he says startled the people of Illinois. The people have a right to expect a Senator to inform himself before he embarks upon the writing of magazine articles on the subject of budgetary legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, we have up for consideration to-day a deficiency measure, and while I shall not speak on the bill in question, yet in view of the fact that we are considering a deficiency measure it seemed to me to be an appropriate occasion to call attention to what is not only a deficiency but something far greater than a deficiency in one of the departments of the Government.

One year has now passed since the Great War closed. The consequences will be felt for decades. The destruction of hundreds of billions of treasure and the loss of millions of human lives call for increased production. This demand arises not only out of economic but moral and patriotic grounds. This call for increased production is the call not only of America but of the human race. During the war, when the Central Powers were seeking the destruction of our country, there were those in our midst enjoying the rights and privileges of this country who in one way or another sought our destruction. While 2,000,000 were fighting abroad they were plotting at home.

In too many instances they were dealt with too leniently. As a result we still have to put up with those who, failing to accomplish their purpose during the war, seek to accomplish it now by inciting others in more or less clever ways to sabotage and acts of violence.

The demand is that Congress do something. Congress has done not only "something" but a great deal, and should do more, but while Congress can enact laws it can not enforce them. That, under our Constitution, is a function of the Executive.

There are two classes of radicals or revolutionary agitators—the alien and the citizen. They should be dealt with separately.

For some years there has been strong Federal legislation providing for the deportation of alien anarchists and forcible revolutionists. The trouble is that the Department of Labor, acting through the Bureau of Immigration, will not enforce existing laws. During the time from July 1, 1916, until October 23, 1919, only 122 alien anarchists have been ordered deported, and of these 122 up to November 1, 1919, only 51 have been deported. Where are the rest? They are either being fed at Government expense at Ellis Island, or are out on bail, or were released on their own recognizance. Some can not even now be found.

My own community, the city of Minneapolis, has had to put up with a Russian by the name of Alexius Georgian. He has now lived in America for about 18 years and is not a citizen. During the fore part of the war he ran a bookstore, where he held open house for the I. W. W., and so forth. He refused to buy bonds or to contribute to the various war funds. In June, 1917, the Department of Justice, in a raid, found and seized circulars which he had for distribution entitled "It is unlawful to request anyone to register," and "Will you act as a man on June 5?" To him, as he expressed it, "citizenship in America was a disgrace."

Finally, after two years had passed, in March of 1919, the Department of Labor acted and he was held to await deportation proceedings. The evidence disclosed the above and his advocacy of the overthrow by force of our Government.

In a meeting on May 12, 1919, he said in an address entitled, "Terrorism versus Bolshevism," after a brief reference to the efforts of Minneapolis citizens to have him deported, that "he would rather be living in Russia under the conditions existing there now than he would in the United States and that there were many others who felt as he did." He then compared the action of our Government in deporting alien anarchists to the action of the Russian Government alleged to have been taken in 1860, when certain peasants, workers, and students were, as he said, deported, and resulting eventually in the revolution in Russia of 1917. He then went on to advocate a revolution and the application of Bolshevist principles in this country, saying that "there was greater need of a revolution and the enactment of Bolshevist principles in this country than there was in Russia preceding the revolution."

This speech was made after his hearing upon deportation and while he was out on bail awaiting the decision of the Secretary of Labor.

The following is a sample of some of the publications seized and offered in evidence at the deportation hearings:

The Rebel Worker.
I. W. W. Song Book.
The Revolutionary Age.
The Class Struggle.
Russia and the League of Nations.
On Behalf of Russia.
An Open Letter to American Liberals.
The Individual and the State.
"U," by Charles W. Ervin.
What Happens in Military Prisons.
The Bolsheviks and the Soviets.
Soviet Russia.
The Russian Constitution.
The Revolutionary I. W. W.

At one of the farewell meetings to Georgian to protest against his deportation he made the statement that "he expected to return to America and that when he did so he would come back under the red flag of Bolshevism."

On June 14, 1919, it was announced by the Department of Labor that he would be deported. Notwithstanding this he continued at large until September, when he was again taken into custody for deportation and sent to New York, where, instead of deporting him, he was released on bail, or upon his own recognizance, and is now editing the Novi Mir, a radical paper in New York City that is engaged in spreading the principles of Bolshevism in America.

Whether or not he ever will be deported, I do not know and can not find out. Two weeks ago the Department of Labor informed me that they were writing me that day regarding it. I am still waiting for the letter.

In any event, with a law providing for deportation and an order of deportation, the Commissioner General of Immigration and the Secretary of Labor continue to permit Georgian to remain at large here with full opportunity to continue his Bolshevistic propaganda.

The excuse: After much labor this department of the Government has finally brought forth the idea that this Government is powerless to deport dangerous Russian agitators, because we have not recognized the present Russian Bolshevist government. Nothing but a bureaucracy could ever bring forth a more nonsensical proposition. To merely state it is sufficient to demonstrate its absurdity. If this theory of bureaucracy is to stand, any government not enjoying recognition by our Government would be free to dump its undesirables here and we as a sovereign power would be helpless to send them back again.

This same Secretary of Labor has refused to deport alien members of the I. W. W. notwithstanding the fact that that organization teaches and advocates sabotage and criminal syndicalism, which is in direct violation of the present deportation statutes providing for the deportation of all aliens. The Federal law provides that aliens—

Who are members of or affiliated with any organization that entertains a belief in, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law; or that teaches or advocates the unlawful destruction of property.

Here is another instance of special solicitude and tenderness toward an I. W. W., who has also been instrumental in preaching strife, revolution, and violence. He was quite prominent in various meetings to protest against the deportation of the anarchist, Georgian. I said he was given special care and consideration by a high official in this administration. My proof:

Allan S. Broms, companion of Georgian, resided in Minnesota in June, 1917. He was in apparent accord with Georgian's views as to the draft, and although an American citizen, refused to register. Discovered by local officials he was jailed and finally forced into the Army and sent to Camp Dodge, Iowa, where he was assigned to Company M, Three hundred and fifty-first Infantry. He there commenced his duties as a soldier by refusing to sign the muster roll or don the uniform. He was thereupon tried by general court-martial and sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, forfeiture of pay, and to serve 20 years in Leavenworth. His case was reviewed. In his opinion sustaining conviction, Gen. Crowder, Judge Advocate General, said:

Short of armed mutiny, nothing more inimical to military discipline can be imagined than conduct such as displayed by the accused in this case. From the transcript of his statement contained in the record it is plain that he is not only an educated man but possessed of an energetic and forceful power of presentation and endowed with faculties calculated to give him more than an ordinary influence over his hearers and render him conspicuously successful in the work of proselyting, in which it is not unreasonable to infer he has been engaged. A man such as this allowed at large is incalculably more dangerous than an enemy spy. His seditious doctrines are of a character which, if permitted dissemination, would sap the very foundations of our Government.

What was done with him, then? The records show that Dr. Keppel, Third Assistant Secretary of War, the special friend of Roger Baldwin, of the National Civil Liberties Bureau, and now serving in a Federal prison for obstructing the draft—the same Dr. Keppel who was such a friend of the conscientious objector—appeared and interceded for him, whereupon the sentence was reduced from 20 to 3 years. One would naturally suppose that this man, who, in the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, was "incalculably more dangerous than an enemy spy," would be kept where other dangerous men are kept. He was for a short time only, when by what appears to have been a mistake he was released from Leavenworth in March, 1919, with more than two years to serve.

The commandant immediately asked the Judge Advocate General if he could not pick him up. Gen. Kreger, Acting Judge Advocate General, said:

It is the opinion of this office that Broms can be legally taken into custody and returned to the barracks to serve the unexpired portion of confinement.

That sounds like good law and good sense. Was he picked up? No. The War Department has permitted this man Broms to remain at large from that day until this, while he has been making full use of the opportunity to continue his revolutionary work. What is he doing?

In August of this year he was placed in charge of the Communist Party headquarters, at 1217 Hennepin Avenue, relieving one Charles Dirba, the national secretary, who was to stand trial for evading the draft. He there associated himself with another official and organizer of the Communist Party, C. E. Ruthenberg, who, while in Minneapolis in August of this year, in referring to the Communist Party, said:

That the Communist Party was in sympathy with the I. W. W. and opposed to any effort to change conditions by the ballot. That his party would participate in elections only for the purpose of educating the masses on communist principles.

He has been attending meetings with Georgian, Louis Frania, editor of The Revolutionary Age, and other similar types. In one of the meetings in Minneapolis Frania referred to the coal miners as "very valuable revolutionary material" and "that the breaking up of the American Federation of Labor was the most important task before them." He then advocated an uprising of the workers and the instituting of a soviet form of government. At a meeting of November 1 of this year in Minneapolis Broms referred to certain events in American history in the following language:

It was not the American people who revolted against England in the Revolutionary War, but it was "Big Business."

* * * * * * *

George Washington led the American forces of the Revolutionary War because he feared he would lose 30,000 acres of land.

* * * * * * *

That American school children are not given "the inside information" about our history and our Government.

It was with this knowledge of Broms's activities and his previous conviction that I looked up his record last September and made inquiry of The Adjutant General as to why Broms was being given this special consideration. This is what I found:

Fortified with the opinion of the Judge Advocate General that Broms could and should be rearrested, on May 14 of this year The Adjutant General wrote the Secretary of War of the mistake made in releasing the prisoner, and requesting that authority be given to the commandant to send guards to Minnesota and there to take Broms into custody. Every military official, from the lowest to the highest, saw the rank injustice to the prisoners at Leavenworth—many of them fighting men who had committed breaches against military law and discipline—in permitting Broms to retain his liberty. They also recognized the danger in permitting such a man to continue his revolutionary propaganda. But under the law and regulations Broms could not be rearrested without the approval of the Secretary of War.

The matter was then presented to the Secretary of War by The Adjutant General. Thereupon the Secretary of War overruled the commandant at Leavenworth.

I insert a verbatim copy of the request of The Adjutant General in reference to Allan S. Broms, with an indorsement thereon disapproving the same:

A. G. 201 (Broms, Allan S.).
Miscl. Div.

MAY 14, 1919.

Memorandum for the Third Assistant Secretary of War.

Subject: Return to confinement of a general prisoner released by mistake from the U. S. D. B.

1. The accompanying correspondence shows that Allan S. Broms, late private, Company M, 351st Infantry, N. A., who was tried at Camp Dodge, Iowa, and whose case was published in G. C. M. O. #21, Headquarters 88th Division, Camp Dodge, Iowa, March 7, 1918, and who was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged from the service, to forfeit all pay due or to become due, and to be confined for twenty years, was under date of March 11, 1919, granted a remission of seventeen years of his sentence of confinement. On March 18, 1919, Broms was, thru a mistake at the U. S. Disciplinary Barracks, given his dishonorable discharge certificate and was released from confinement.

2. Under date of April 11, 1919, the commandant U. S. D. B. reports that Broms is in Minneapolis, Minnesota.

3. The release of this man was without authority. The commandant desires him returned to custody.

4. The Judge Advocate General is of opinion that Broms can be legally taken into custody and returned to the United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to serve the unexpired portion of his sentence to confinement as remitted.

5. The clemency board is of opinion that the maximum remission justified by a careful review of the proceedings of the G. C. M. was given in this case. In justice to other prisoners serving similar sentences, I am of opinion that Broms should be returned to the U. S. D. B. to complete his sentence of confinement as remitted.

6. It is proposed to direct the commandant U. S. D. B. to send an officer and one man to Minneapolis, Minnesota, to rearrest Broms and take him to the U. S. D. B. at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

7. It is recommended that you give your approval to this action.

(Signed) J. T. KERR,
Adjutant General,
In Charge of Office.

(1st Ind.)

Third Assistant Secretary of War, May 17, 1919. To The Adjutant General.

1. By personal direction of the Secretary of War, disapproved, in view of the fact that the prisoner is in legal possession of a discharge certficate and has been released from confinement.

(Signed) F. P. KEPPEL,
Third Assistant Secretary.

A true copy:
H. C. WILLIAMS,
Col., A. G.

In final reply to my various inquiries regarding this case The Adjutant General, under date of September 25, 1919, wrote me as follows:

With reference to your letter of September 22, relative to the case of Allan S. Broms, Company M, Three hundred and fifty-first Infantry, who was tried and sentenced to a term of confinement at Fort Leavenworth, and who was erroneously released from confinement prior to the expiration of his sentence, I beg to say that at the time it was discovered that this prisoner had been erroneously released the case was brought to the personal attention of the Secretary of War, who decided that no steps would be taken looking to the prisoner's apprehension to serve out the balance of his sentence, in view of the fact that the prisoner was in legal possession of a discharge certificate and had been released from confinement. No further action by the War Department is therefore deemed advisable in the case.

(Signed) P. C. HARRIS,
Adjutant General.

Here is the opinion of the United States district attorney of Minnesota in reference to Broms:

Broms was one of the most flagrant offenders we had to deal with during the war.

Upon being asked to have Broms rearrested, so as to serve out the remainder of his sentence, the district attorney said:

I can do nothing. This office was never consulted in reference to the release of Broms and would not have favored it.

Here, then, is the situation: Broms, a draft obstructor and evader, then a fake "conscientious objector," was released by mistake from a Federal prison. The commandant at Leavenworth; the judge advocate stationed there; Acting Judge Advocate Gen. Kreger; Maj. Gen. P. C. Harris, The Adjutant General; and the Department of Justice—all anxious to have Broms serve the remainder of his well-deserved sentence—are stopped and thwarted in their efforts by the "personal orders" of Newton D. Baker, the Secretary of War.

In the meantime some of his comrades, or rather those who would have been his comrades if he had served in his division—the Eighty-eighth—were lying beneath the soil of France, while the remainder were, long after this proceeding of the Secretary of War, being held over in France as a part of the American Expeditionary Forces.

Responsibility, then, for releasing and permitting to remain at large Allan S. Broms, whom the Judge Advocate General characterized as "more dangerous than an enemy spy," and who is now engaged in going about this country preaching revolution and slandering the memory of George Washington and other Revolutionary heroes, rests upon Newton D. Baker, our Secretary of War, and no one else.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What were the observations made by the Secretary of War at the time? What comment did he make upon it?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So far as I know, he made no comment whatever, except that by his personal direction the man, having been released by mistake, should be permitted to remain at large. I have not talked personally with the Secretary of War in connection with the matter, but the Secretary of War had before him all of the papers in the case.

There is still another radical agitator, also an American citizen, who was shown marked favors and consideration by the War Department. I refer to Robert Minor, a well-known and recognized radical, and an associate of Thomas J. Mooney, Emma Goldman, Alexander Berkman, and others. Previous to the war he busied himself making speeches against a program of preparedness and recommending to his hearers the use of "direct action" in preventing its adoption. His name was associated with papers like the Masses, Solidarity, and others. In every way he was known as an extreme radical agitator and syndicalist.

Notwithstanding this, in July of 1918, he was given by our Government a passport to proceed to Russia, where he became an associate and intimate of Lenin and Trotski. He is now engaged in going about this country posing as a former representative of the United States Government in investigating the Lenin and Trotski government in Soviet Russia. He then proceeds to say that he is not a radical but a neutral, and therefore in a position to give an impartial account of the workings of the new Russian government and the benefits of the soviet government. He thereupon gives his eulogistic speech upon Bolshevism and the soviet republic.

This man belongs in jail, and would be in a Federal prison to-day if some one in high authority in this Government had not intervened to prevent it.

After completing his mission in Soviet Russia he proceeded to implant seeds of Bolshevism in the American Army of occupation in Germany. It was not fertile soil, however. We had in that Army a good military intelligence department. It has learned that certain German Bolshevists were planning to spread Bolshevist propaganda among our troops.

Sergt. Siegfried, in that service, disguised as a deserter, gained the confidence of this group, and ascertained that a movement was on foot to spread Bolshevism in our Army. He met various people in Germany in that connection. Among them this same Robert Minor. At one of these meetings Minor volunteered to prepare a pamphlet to be used in this propaganda. He prepared such a pamphlet and about 60,000 copies were turned over to the sergeant for distribution.

He (Minor) was later discovered doing similar work among French and British troops. The French arrested him and turned him over to the American Army for trial before a military commission. The charges were substantially as follows:

1. As an American and private citizen he engaged in a campaign of propaganda for the purpose of weakening the military power of the United States Army and the armies of the Allies, and prepared documents with the object of weakening the morale and fighting efficiency of said forces.

2. At or near Dusseldorf, Germany, in February, 1919, he composed a certain document and caused 60,000 copies thereof, in the form of a handbill, to be printed and turned over to a member of the Army of the United States for distribution among the soldiers of said Army, then within the territory of the German Empire.

Could anything be more serious? Was he tried? No; released.

Col. House at that time was in Paris, and Col. House in some manner or other interested himself in Robert Minor.

The order for Minor's trial by military commission bears date of June 20, 1919. Within 15 days after the issuance of the order Robert Minor was ordered released. I quote from the memoranda of the judge advocate in that connection:

The case against Minor at present amounts to this: He is charged with as serious an offense as a man can commit, but there is only one witness against him—Siegfried. Every effort is being made by the Third Army authorities and by the British at Cologne to obtain corroborating witnesses. There are three persons in the hands of the British and American authorities who, it is believed, can corroborate more or less the testimony of Siegfried as to the activities of Minor at Dusseldorf, though it has been impossible as yet to get them to do so. One of them is among the seven undergoing trial by military commission at Cologne, and efforts will be made to get him to tell what he knows as soon as his trial is finished, which will be this week. * * * I have interviewed Siegfried, the officers of G-2, and the judge advocate's department at the headquarters of the Third Army, and have, with Col. Mayes, visited the military commission sitting at Cologne, etc. I thoroughly believe Minor to be guilty, but if I were sitting on a court I would not vote guilty on the evidence now available—the testimony of one man only, and that man acting in the character of a detective and informer. If his testimony were substantially corroborated by other witnesses, I believe a conviction would be justified. It is desirable, of course, if a man is to be convicted, that the case against him be as strong as possible. An offense that is so serious should, in order to justify conviction by a court and approval by the confirming and reviewing authority, be supported by the strongest proof, and since this is a case in which a dangerous element in the United States has the greatest interest it had better not be tried at all unless there is proof which fully warrants conviction. An acquittal, a disapproved conviction, or an approved conviction on anything short of conclusive evidence would be injurious to the cause of good government. It should be known within a week or 10 days at the furthest, I think, whether substantial corroboration of Siegfried's testimony can be had, and if it can I think Minor should be tried. If corroboration can not be had, I think it would be better to dismiss the case.

In other words, Minor was released because there was only the word of the American fighting man, an officer of the Military Intelligence Department, Sergt. Siegfried, against that of Robert Minor, the associate of Mooney, Berkman, and Goldman, and, of course, they could not take and rely upon the word of the fighting man.

But one would have thought that they would have, at least, waited until such time as corroborating evidence could have been obtained. To have done so, however, would have meant the keeping of Robert Minor in jail. That was unthinkable. It is true that many a fighting man who had overstepped the bounds of discipline had to wait in prison sometimes weeks before he was brought to trial, but they could not think of having Minor wait more than 15 days. Was there corroborating evidence? Yes! The very day following Minor's release the authorities located Meta Filip, one of the women whom the intelligence officer had met with Minor at the time of the discussion of the pamphlets. In addition to this, another officer of the Intelligence Service was told by the head of the concern which printed the pamphlets that Minor was the very man who brought the copy to him and ordered them to do the printing. This statement was corroborated by a German employee in the establishment. In further addition, it appears that the Intelligence Service in March of 1919 had an agent in Berlin posing as a Bolshevist, who was there told by Minor that the time was ripe for the spreading of Bolshevist propaganda among the American soldiers.

It will be noted that at the time of the release of Minor they not only had the statement of Sergt. Siegfried, but that other officers in the Intelligence Service then had similar knowledge of Minor's activities. Yet, notwithstanding all of this and the very serious nature of his offense, some one with, certainly, power and influence interceded in Minor's behalf and he was released; otherwise no military official would have shown him any consideration. In any event we know that with the publicity that was given this at the time, and with the President himself in France at the time and personally cognizant of Minor's imprisonment, nothing whatever was done to rearrest Minor immediately after the obtaining of this additional evidence.

Congress should, in my judgment, provide for the deportation of any alien seeking to change our form of government by peaceable means or otherwise. An alien is here by courtesy, and if he does not like our form of government he should get out. I have introduced a bill, which is now before the Immigration Committee of the House, to this effect; but while we give attention to the alien revolutionist let us not forget that we have American citizens, so called, who are preaching revolution, syndicalism, and the overthrow of our Government by forcible, violent means. The man who does so preach or act commits an offense against both State and Nation. The State legislatures should act accordingly. The Federal law should be amended so as to properly take care of this class of citizens. But let us continually bear in mind that it is of no use or consequence to have good laws upon our statute books unless we have men in the executive departments of the Government, from the very highest to the very lowest positions, who, appreciating their oath of office, will see to it that the laws are enforced. They will not be enforced if Bolshevik sympathizers are permitted to remain in the Government.

In view of these facts some publicity has been given to the conduct of the Secretary of War. In that connection I received the other day from a Mr. John Edwin, late of Company A, Twenty-seventh Engineers, and who saw service overseas, a letter, in which Edwin expressed himself in no uncertain terms. In closing I can do no better than to use a portion of his remarks, which were as follows:

> Reading accounts such as that of Broms makes me see red. Not the red of anarchy, but the red blood of 50,000 Americans resting in the cemetery at Romainge, with their lives apparently wasted to purchase immunity and safety for such as he.

How much longer are the affairs of government to be administered by those who give aid and comfort to draft objectors and evaders and Bolshevik sympathizers? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to make some observations relative to a trip I made to Europe last June, at which time I visited a number of places, including Berlin, Germany, and Amerongen, Holland, the place where the Kaiser is interned. I brought with me from Berlin a series of German medals which represent a form of propaganda that was used among the German people for the purpose of teaching them that the people of the United States were not interested in the war, that they were not standing behind their Government, and in their unprepared condition they were not capable of rendering any service to the Allies in the event the United States became a participant. If I secure sufficient time I shall be glad to explain their meaning, as each one of them relates to some particular incident during the war and many directly refer to the President of the United States.

CONDITIONS IN HOLLAND.

Holland as a nation does not appear to have suffered very much during the war. Her people were well clothed and seemed to be properly nourished. In fact, there was apparent every sign of prosperity. I never saw in any country so many cattle, and if there had been a severe shortage of food, as was reported to the people of the United States, it is very evident to my mind that some of these herds of cattle would have been used to feed the people. According to the information given me, Holland is 50 per cent German, and I was informed by persons I talked to, and this included soldiers in the Holland Army, that in the event it had been necessary to take sides in this war that the forces of Holland would have been allied with Germany. I was also informed by what I considered to be reliable authority that thousands of the citizens of Holland were enriched during the war by being engaged in smuggling merchandise and food into the German lines. The laws of Holland against violations of this kind were so slack that the penalties in comparison with the profit to be made seemingly were an indirect invitation to many to engage in this occupation.

VISIT TO THE KAISER.

After visiting the cities of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, The Hague, and Utrecht, in company with Congressman LOUIS B. GOODALL, we arrived at the little village of Amerongen, the place where Count Bentinct extended the hospitality of his castle to William Hohenzollern, the former Emperor of Germany. We were cordially received by a representative of the Associated Press and informed that we were the first Members of Congress to visit that little village. Being interested in seeing the castle, the representative of the Associated Press volunteered to accompany us on an inspection tour. Leaving the little hotel, we walked to the front gate of the palace, where we met Count Bentinct, who exchanged courtesies with our attendant by bowing very low. We were taken around to the side of the palace where it was possible to see the place where the Kaiser saws wood each day for exercise. Some very good photographs were taken, and then we returned to the hotel for a meal. While sitting at the table we saw approaching a person who, we were informed, was the Kaiser's doctor, and it was suggested that probably the Kaiser was sending him over to ascertain who we were and find out what was our business. This deduction was correct, for presently the door opened and he came into the room. Realizing he might be considered an intruder, he bowed, apologized, and went out. As we came out of the dining room the correspondent of the London Daily Mail called me to one side and said: "Mr. McCLINTIC, you will doubtless be interested in knowing that I have just received a telephone message from the castle asking who you were, what you were doing here, and what is your business." Continuing, he said: "I informed him an American officer, an American soldier in an American Army car, with two Members of the United States Congress, were making an official inspection trip. He asked for the names, but I did not feel warranted in giving this information." The fact that the Kaiser was apparently worried over the sudden appearance of an American delegation did not disturb any of our party. In reality, had it been possible to have had an interview with him, I am sure we could have imparted some very interesting information as to how the average American citizen regarded him.

Soon thereafter we started for Belgium. About a half mile from this village two Holland officers came out on the road and held up their hands. Our car came to a stop, and they immediately opened the side doors for the purpose of making an inspection. We had a large can of gasoline covered with a blanket, and it amused us very much to see them lift this blanket for the purpose of seeing if we were concealing anything or taking out of Holland something we should not. After being satisfied, they closed the doors and allowed us to continue our trip.

The next city of importance was Nyjmigen. This is a very important city in Holland, because several famous treaties have been entered into at this place. After being ferried across the river, we drove up the main street of Nyjmigen. Suddenly an officer came out and stopped our car. We tried to converse with him in German, French, and English, but apparently he could only speak and understand the language of his country. In a very few moments a large crowd had gathered around our car. I realized it was going to be necessary to secure the aid of an interpreter, and standing on the dashboard of the car I said, "Is there anyone here who speaks English?" A person in the rear of the crowd put up his hand, and I invited him to come up and ask the policeman what he wanted. He complied with my request, and after a few words of conversation he said, "He thinks that you have stolen an automobile." [Laughter.]

I said to him, "Tell him he has another think coming. This is an American car and the number on it corresponds with the number on our papers, which give us permission to visit this country." He gave him this information, but evidently the officer had heard of the ingenuity of the average American citizen, for he replied, "American paint out numbers and put new ones on." Realizing the officer was determined to gain his purpose, I requested the interpreter to find out what he wanted us to do. He replied by saying he wished us to accompany him to that place which corresponds with our American jail. Being certain it was useless to make any further objections, I said, "Tell him to get up in the front seat with the driver, as we are ready to go with him." I wish you could have seen that cop as he drove up the main street with Congressman GOODALL and myself under arrest. Sitting on the front seat proud and erect, he would bow to his friends on each side as if to say, "Look what I have captured to-day." Practically all of the people who saw our American car being accompanied by the policeman followed us to the great walled inclosure which was used by the city authorities to take care of those who violated the laws of the land. While on the inside looking out I took a very interesting photograph of the street full of people, who apparently were waiting to see what the verdict would be. After our papers were examined by the chief magistrate and our names taken down we were exonerated from the charge made by the policeman and allowed to continue on our way. The only deduction I can make was that the Kaiser wanted to know who those two Members of the United States Congress were that visited him, and this method was used for that purpose.

TRIP TO BERLIN.

The entire congressional delegation was interested in making a trip to Germany. We had no difficulty in getting to Coblenz, and while there we were given permission to go up and down the Rhine in order that we might view that most wonderful scenery. One of the most interesting points visited was the Kaiser's palace on the Rhine. Being admitted through the walls into the inclosure immediately adjacent to this famous old building, I happened to turn and look back toward the wall, where I saw a German inscription which related to the fatherland and in substance said, "God and the fatherland shall prevail forever." I could also see the great German Fort Erenbrinstine which, it is said, commands the finest view of any fort in all of Germany. At the top of the flagstaff could be seen the American flag—"Old Glory"—proudly waving its folds to the world. I said to the American officer in charge, "Surely the Kaiser, when he associated himself with God, overlooked the fact that this nation might some day become involved with the United States, for if he had he would never have allowed this inscription to become the slogan of Germany." Entering the castle, we were told by the caretaker that visitors put on cloth overshoes in order to keep from scratching the Kaiser's hardwood floors. We did not give a continental about the Kaiser's wishes at that time, but desiring to be courteous, we put them on. Then we learned that if we raised our feet the cloth shoes would come off, and so as we slided back and forth over the splendid hardwood floors, instead of scratching them up we were giving them a first-class polish. So much for "German efficiency." After examining the antique furniture, the old paintings, and the other elaborate furnishings we were taken to what was said to be the Kaiser's favorite room. In that room was to be found practically every kind of fighting apparatus that had been invented for a thousand years or more. The walls were covered with armor, shields, guns, swords, pistols, knives, and so forth, showing that the uppermost thought in his mind was the destruction of mankind and the conquering of the other nations of the earth.

Returning to Coblenz, we informed the officers of the Third Army, who were indeed very courteous to us, that it was our desire to visit Berlin. The next morning the general in charge of the interallied food commission at Berlin sent for us. He informed us that he had learned that it was our intention to visit Berlin, and as a representative of the American Army he felt it was his duty to give us the following information. He said: "There is at present a street car strike in Berlin and over 3,000 people have been killed in street fighting. Practically all of the public buildings have been shot up; food is very scarce; and inasmuch as the American Government very much desires that nothing happen that might in any way embarrass our country, I doubt the advisability of you gentlemen making this trip." I have always had a great deal of curiosity, and being anxious to have the opportunity of observing the conditions in Berlin prior to the time the food embargo would be raised, I said to him, "I am very anxious to make this trip, and if I go unaccompanied and on my own responsibility, after being duly warned by you, would it in any way embarrass our country?" He replied, "I think not." The headquarters of the Third Army telegraphed to Berlin and asked permission for me to make the trip. I have here the first German military pass issued to a Member of the United States Congress since the war:

GERMAN MILITARY PASS.

CERTIFICATE.

Valid from July 10th to 20th, 1919.

The Hon. J. V. MCCLINTIC, Member of the Congress of the United States, has permission to proceed by rail to Berlin on official business, and will return upon completion to Coblenz.

All authorities and sentinels are requested to let him pass unmolestedly, and in case of need to help and assist him.

[SEAL.] KÜHLENTHAL,
Major in the General Staff and Chief of the German Military Commission.
[SEAL.] STOLZ.

This pass must be returned to our office upon its expiration. If not returned further passes into unoccupied Germany will not be granted.

The other members of the congressional delegation decided they did not care to make the trip under such circumstances, and 16 hours thereafter I arrived in the city of Berlin. The railroads of Germany have a different system of collecting tickets from ours. Instead of taking the tickets up on the train they are collected from a person after he arrives at his destination in going out of the depot. I do not speak any German, and thinking I was riding on a German military pass, when I got off the train I came out of the depot without paying any attention to anything that might have been said to me by the person who looks after the collection of fares. Upon reaching the main street outside the depot I saw hundreds of German soldiers walking idly back and forth. The only way they were armed was that each one of them carried a short knife attached to a belt. No street cars were running and every kind of a vehicle was pressed into service in order to accommodate those who wished to travel from one place to the other. The supply of rubber in Germany has been exhausted and the automobiles had coil-spring wheels, which apparently made a very good substitute, except they produced a lot of noise. Instead of burning gasoline they were using a chemical solution prepared for use in the German submarines. It gave off a very offensive odor. In fact, you could smell one of these cars some time before you could hear or see it. As I stood on the street corner that day waiting to secure some kind of a vehicle to take me to the Adalon Hotel an officer walked up and took me by the arm. I asked him in English what he wanted. He said something to me in German. The results of the conversation were 50-50, because I do not understand a word of German and apparently he did not understand a word of English. I presented him with my German military pass, but apparently that did not seem to satisfy him. A crowd soon began to collect around me and in a few moments I was the center of attraction, as it seemed every person in that section of the city was trying to read the statements contained in my military pass. The position was uncomfortable and I became very uneasy, fearing that the statement that I was a Member of the United States Congress might embitter the crowd and cause me a lot of trouble. In a few minutes I happened to see an American soldier. I called on him for assistance. He immediately interpreted for me and informed me that I had not paid my railroad fare, and for this reason I was being held. I was very glad to pay the amount called for by the officer, and in a few minutes I was on my way to the Adalon Hotel. I do not remember the name of the American soldier that rendered me this assistance, but should he read this statement I shall be very glad to have him communicate with me.

Arriving at the American headquarters in Berlin, I was informed that I was the first Representative of the American Congress to visit that city since the war. I am especially indebted to Col. Parker and Lieut. Sonfield, of Texas, for the many courtesies extended to me while I was in that city. Through their kindness an arrangement was made for a German officer, who commanded the artillery at Verdun against the Allies, to accompany me on an inspection trip. I saw the public buildings showing huge scars, the result of street fighting. These buildings were guarded with machine guns and many of them had barbed-wire entanglements surrounding the entrances so they could not be suddenly rushed. We inspected the famous street where the statues of the ancestors of the Kaiser are to be seen. It is said the school children of this city were required once each week to march up and down this street and give these statues a salute of honor. At the head of this street is to be seen the famous wooden statue of Hindenburg. This was used by the German Government during the war to inspire loyalty and patriotism in the selling of German bonds. Instead of pinning a button on the lapel of the coat of a purchaser, as we did in the United States, they would allow each purchaser of a German bond to walk up to this statue and with a hammer drive a nail in the same. To me this is a very queer idea, and the only solution that I can make of it is that Germany has always ruled with the mailed fist—iron and steel—and the purpose of this procedure was to harden the hearts of her citizens and make them more determined to stand by Germany until she had won the war.

Passing under the famous Brandenburg gates could be seen a soldier with machine gun standing on top watching for the appearance of any trouble with the Sparticans. At the front door of the Adalon Hotel was another German soldier, standing with his helmet on waiting to give the alarm in case there should be any appearance of trouble.
